Yet in some respects the Congress was a disappointment. Not all of its work was of the practical sort that was expected. It has accomplished nothing really new. There was, perhaps, a little too much sacrificed for mere oratorical effect and too great latitude was allowed to speakers who could hardly be expected to contribute valuable aid to a working convention. There were even college professors and others from whom something might have been expected in the way of concrete wisdom, who showed very little. In some of the meetings the irrepressible crank element was in evidence, as it usually is at the beginning of every great movement, and more than one speaker seemed to be at variance with the general sentiment.

Unquestionably, the most notable contribution to the Congress was the strong letter of President Roosevelt which gave the right keynote to the entire proceedings, and was practically a platform of itself. Followed by the able speeches of Secretary Root, Baron de Constant, Hon. Oscar S. Straus, Mr. Bryan and a few others, who took broad and statesmanlike views of the questions at issue, it materially helped to relieve the monotony.

In the resolutions, the Congress discarded all platitudes and dealt with practicalities, urging our government to use its influence in securing the permanency of the Hague Court as an open tribunal of recognized authority and favoring a general arbitration treaty.

The arbitration principle is distinctly Christian, and in applying it to international disputes, rulers, cabinets and governments, irrespective of religion, may well be advised to follow the course laid down by the Master in Matthew 18: 15-17. This is arbitration in its most rigid and righteous interpretation, and if applied to any unduly belligerent nation by the other signatories to a general arbitration treaty, the offending power would quickly come to terms, rather than run the risk of an international ostracism which would, in the end, prove more costly than the war itself. As the Peace Congress was unofficial, its influence is purely ethical, and it would not have been out of place had it gone a little further and shown how arbitration could be made of practical value in the way indicated.

Love the Supreme Test

FROM letters received from correspondents of all denominations, we infer that many of our friends are harassed by questions that should not cause them serious concern. Some are distressed by difficulties about predestination, election and divine sovereignty; others by the mystery of the Fall and the effect of Adam's sin on his descendants; and others again on the genuineness of their own conversion. It is sad that so many should be in actual distress through dwelling on these subjects. They are matters apart from daily life and Christian duty. The language of Scripture is plain as to the nature of the kingdom of God and the character of those who belong to it.

Christ said explicitly, "The kingdom of God is within you." The solution of the mystery of predestination, of the Fall, of the life in heaven or in hell, do not concern any man so much as the question whether he has the godly nature, whether he is like God, so far as it is possible for a human being to be like him. The apostle John tells us that "God is love," and that is a test which any man can apply to himself. If he hates another, if he cherishes a grudge against one who has injured him, if he is selfish and seeks an advantage for himself at the cost of another, if he has no concern about those who are in poverty and suffering, if, in short, all his interest is concentrated in himself, then he should realize that the kingdom of God is not in him, for his nature is antagonistic to God. It is the godlike who are in the kingdom of God. There is no surer test of conversion than the attitude of a man to other men. The converted man loves his brother even though his brother is unlovable. That is to be like God, who so loved us that "when we were yet enemies Christ died for us."

It may be said, such love is unnatural. How can we love one who is unlovable? It is against human nature to love one who is malignant and is trying to do us harm. We know it. It is against human nature, but that is the triumph of Christianity. It enables us to overcome human nature. That is the work of the spirit of Christ within us. When the kingdom of God is within us, we are able to do things that otherwise we could not do. We realize our brotherhood as children of one Father. The father loves his undutiful child in spite of his disobedience and seeks to win him to a better state of mind. He hates his sin, but he loves the child; so we may hate the evil in the nature of our brother, but we may love our brother in spite of it and seek to win him. In so doing we are like Christ, who came to save the lost, and we give proof that the kingdom of God is within us.

A Great Historic Event

IT was a scene in marked contrast to the event that it commemorated that was presented to the eyes of those visitors who were present last week at the opening of the great Exposition at Norfolk, held to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of Jamestown, the first permanent settlement of Anglo-Saxons on the American Continent. The members of the first colony were bold, hardy adventurers, who, when they first saw the pleasant waters of the bay, and the shore clad in the green of the spring woods, thought they had found the land of promise in Virginia, the new El Dorado.

If these same adventurers could have returned in their high-decked galleons to visit the scenes of their trials and sufferings, they would have found that their hopes had come true for their descendants. Warships of all the great nations were there, the black muzzles of their guns belching salutes in honor of a flag whose folds of red, and white, and blue had been unthought of for nearly two centuries after the first settlers came in between the capes. They would have seen the shores once green with primeval forests, now dotted with great resorts and flourishing cities, and at one side the walls of America's impregnable Fortress Monroe. Straight in front they would have seen a dream city, a collection of palaces that illustrate the progress of America for three hundred years. These same adventurers, if they could have landed and gone from the Government Building to the Palace of Arts, the Palace of Manufactures, the Palace of Commerce, the States' Exhibit Palace; and then watched the faces of the people from over forty States of the greatest nation in the Western World, they would have felt that when they constructed the first rude block-house at Jamestown, and laid the bricks of the church whose ruined tower still holds high its battered crest, they had indeed built better than they knew.

That the Exposition will be a success is undoubted, as people from all over the country, especially those of the North, are planning a trip to Jamestown as part of their summer vacations. Those who cannot attend will follow its fortunes with their best wishes and read with interest the accounts of its pageants as they appear in the columns of the daily press.

Our Heroic Missionaries

SECRETARY McCREA, of the Missionary Committee now operating at Chinkiang, in his remarkable letter which appears in another part of this issue, lets in a flood of light on the Chinese famine situation.

As we read it, we unconsciously begin to comprehend, with the missionaries themselves, the frightful magnitude of this disaster which has settled down like a death-pall over six of the fairest provinces in China. We see the missionaries leaving their familiar post tasks and gathering at the summons of their le like a little band of heroes, to save the suffering. is it a campaign without danger, for famine brings train fever and pestilence, with diseases that down both the strong and the feeble. The unb dead are a menace everywhere. But the brave wo have been preserved through all dangers thus far we trust they may be kept safely to the end.

We do not believe that any one who reads McCrea's letter can withhold approval of the spl energy and rare fidelity with which the mission have carried out the trust imposed upon them in th position of the famine funds. Never before had a commissariat such a task as this, which involves feeding of half a million destitute, not for a day, bu weeks and months. This great host is increased every remittance. This means, as the Secretary's l clearly explains, that every additional dollar sent brings life to some one—the gift is literally a rep from death by hunger.

Beyond the present sphere of missionary relief region where the famine is still doing its awful worl hindered. It may be weeks before the curtain is w lifted, so that the world may know the true exte the tragedy that is now taking place in Honan other remote sections. To reach out hands of he the most accessible of these places is now the mis aries' purpose. The $50,000 cabled this week by CHRISTIAN HERALD, in response to their urgent ap will doubtless greatly aid in accomplishing this ob God grant they may reach these remote sufferers e is too late.

Earthquake in Mexico

EWS coming from Chilpancingo, Mexico, dated April 15, caused new uneasiness in the earthquake region. It stated that the city had been almost oyed by an earthquake which had occurred shortly e midnight. The earth continued to rock at half intervals, each quake bringing down more buildings. er telegrams the following morning stated that towns had been partially or wholly leveled. Among were Chilapa, Tixtia, Ayutea and Ometepeo. As reports came in, it appeared that every town on the coast from Acapulco to Salina Cruz had suffered. hes, hospitals and schools were shaken and in many nces were heaps of ruins. The loss of life, so far as d be ascertained, was less than might have been ex- ed. Conservative estimates place the number of the at about one hundred, but those familiar with the ict fear it will not fall short of five hundred. As the hquake occurred when the people had retired to it is thought that whole families may be buried in uins of their houses, with none to report the disaster. believed that the centre of the disturbance was at At Acapulco, gigantic waves swept over the break- r, and although not a breath of air was stirring, the was lashed to a fury, and the bed of the harbor was d more than two feet. A peculiar phenomenon is after the first great shock the air was filled for many s with a sickening, sulphurous odor. This caused t distress to the survivors. There many speculations as to the cause his, and some consider it as a proof the earthquake had its origin in e subterranean explosion.

lexico was not the only sufferer from disturbance of the earth. Other ntries throughout the world reported ous shocks. Reports from Chile w that shocks were felt there and t a great volcano has burst forth violent eruption. Earthquakes urred on April 17 in various parts of ope. The most noticeable were in stantinople and its neighborhood in the Tyrol, where a huge land- e resulted. There was also a severe ck at Askabad. In Spain, Totana Lorca, in the province of Murcia, e hard hit and much damage done re by severe shocks. In Chile, yehue, a volcano adjacent to the ge lake of the same name in the vince of Valdivia, burst into violent ption. Torrents of lava flowed from which set fire to the surrounding ests and people and cattle fled in ror. Scientists tell us there is no nection between these distant cks, but the fact of their occurring the same time as one another appears indicate a deep-seated and far- ching disturbance of the earth's crust, which is dis- ieting to the lay mind. The Christian, however, uld not be alarmed. Christ foretold that just such amities would occur before the beginning of the end.

here shall be great earthquakes in divers places and famines pestilences (Luke 21 : 11).

Brother Repudiated

A wealthy citizen of Pennsylvania received applications ently for assistance from a young man in Seattle, Wash., o claimed to be his brother, Yost. The Pennsylvanian had a brother Yost, whom he had not seen in thirty-six years, and who was supposed to have run away from the old family home to sea. He was dubious about the man being really his brother, but as the request was for a comparatively small sum he complied. Subsequently an application came for a larger amount. Having to go West on business soon, the Pennsylvanian did not respond, but went on to Seattle to look at his supposed brother. On his arrival he made inquiry, and the man was pointed out to him. He promptly declared that he was no brother of his and had him arrested as an impostor. The imprisoned man insisted with so much earnestness on his identity that the United States Commissioner took a personal interest in the case. He caused the prisoner and his accuser to write a list of family names and of family events which could be known only to brothers. The lists were written by the one in his prison and the other at his hotel, and were sent to the Commissioner. He found that the lists tallied, and sending for the prosecutor he showed him the result. He was at once convinced and went to the prison with the Commissioner's authority and released his brother and took him away to his own home. No better plan could have been devised for testing the relationship. It is not, however, in that way that the brother in Christ is identified. His creed may be orthodox and his acquaintance with Scripture extensive, and yet he may not be a son of God or a brother in Christ.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another (John 13: 35).

A New Discovery in Egypt

News has been received at Baltimore, Md., that Professor Dennis of that city, now making excavations in Egypt, in association with M. Edouard Naville, has found a shrine of great historic interest. It was at first thought to have been the tomb of Mentuhotep I., a king of the eleventh dynasty, which long antedated the period of Joseph. Further examination, however, coupled with the fact that there was no sarcophagus there, nor any of the sculptures usually found in Egyptian tombs, leads Egyptologists to think that it is not a tomb, but a shrine, an abode of the Ka, or soul, of the great king. The excavators came upon a tunnel cut in the solid rock, about two hundred yards in length. The walls are of dry stone, and resting on them are sandstone blocks forming an arch. At the end of the tunnel the excavators entered a room built entirely of granite, in which was a shrine of alabaster. Remains were found there of an ancient statue and the floor was strewn with fragments of furniture and cloth which had once contained mummified animals. The presence of these articles is explained by an inscription at the entrance to the tunnel set there by command of a successor of the great Mentuhotep, in which he orders that food and drink should be brought every day to the shrine, and that at certain feasts a portion of the slaughtered animals, duly roasted, should be placed there. This order agrees with what we know of the ancient Egyptian custom of providing for the nourishment of the Ka, or soul, of the dead monarch. There is also another inscription somewhat mutilated, which shows that the shrine was ancient at the time of the oppression of the Israelites, for Rameses II., the tyrant whose daughter adopted Moses, gives orders for its preservation. It is strange that a people so intelligent as the Egyptians should have worshiped a dead king and should not have been disillusioned when they found that the food they provided for him was not eaten.

Behold, they are all vanity; their works are nothing (Isa. 41 : 29).

A Thief Self-caught

The police of the Sixty-eighth Street Precinct in New York received a hurried telephone call one evening recently to send an officer to the private residence of a merchant in the neighborhood. A man was sent and he heard a strange story. The merchant had been absent in the city, and his wife, while sitting alone in the parlor, had heard a strange noise overhead, and going to the foot of the stairs, saw a strange man passing on a landing above. She gave an alarm, and the man hid in a closet and shut the door. The lady knew that the door of the closet had a spring-lock which could not be opened from inside. She therefore telephoned the police, and waited for their arrival. The thief, suspecting what had occurred, made desperate efforts to get out, but found himself securely trapped. Presently the door was opened by the officer and he was taken to prison. It is not often that the wrongdoer walks so directly into a trap that has not been set for him; but in surveying his life at the close, he sees that his own evil courses that he has chosen have destroyed him.

The wicked is snared in the work of his own hands (Ps. 9 : 16).

An Absent-minded Lawyer

A case was called in a court in Jersey City, N. J., recently, which could not be tried owing to the absence of important witnesses. The judge inquired from the lawyers when the witnesses could be there and adjourned the trial. It remained to fix a day for hearing it and he asked the lawyers on both sides to arrange for a day convenient to them and to the court. It was definitely fixed for an early date and the court proceeded to other business. Later in the day the lawyer retained for the defense in the adjourned case came into court and asked for a change of date. "Sorry," said the judge, "but I do not see how a change can be made now." The lawyer appeared greatly disappointed. He said, "The fact is, I had arranged to be married on that day and forgot it. It will cause great embarrassment." The judge said it was an unusual circumstance for a man to forget so important an engagement, but he would not spoil any man's wedding day. The lady to whom the lawyer was to be married would not be pleased if she heard of the incident. It indicated that neither she nor his marriage occupied his mind as she might naturally expect it to do. However, he did go to court and got the legal engagement postponed. This is more than some do, who, having pledged themselves to Christ, allow business or pleasure to intervene and sometimes fail to keep their promise to him altogether.

They made light of it and went their way, one to his farm and another to his merchandise (Matt. 22 : 5).

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

New Help for Housewives

THE problem of domestic service is constantly discussed in the newspapers and forms a staple subject of talk in suburban households where the difficulty is to obtain help of any kind, trained or untrained. A great host of independent matrons do not trouble themselves in the least about the domestic situation, having found it both possible, pleasant and economical to do their own work. Where a mother or daughter, or daughters, can divide the tasks of the home, each taking a share, there is usually much comfort in daily living, food is well cooked and agreeably served, and the workers do not find themselves overwearied by their tasks. In this country there are multitudes of gentlewomen who do their own work and have time enough for reading, recreation and society.

There are also, notwithstanding an incessant murmur of complaint, not a few faithful helpers who live for periods of years with their friendly employers. Last summer a certain family were sadly bereft in the death of a competent and cheery woman who had shared their joys and sorrows in the capacity of maid-of-all-work for twenty-four consecutive years. Another family are blissfully exempt from the trials about which we hear so much since their maid has lived with them from youth to middle age, and is contented and efficient as ever after twenty-seven years of service. When we hear of such examples, we may take for granted that there have been common sense, consideration and cordial friendship on both sides.

There are, however, numerous householders who may be interested to learn something of the co-operative scheme of Mr. Otto Fick, who has come from Denmark to make investigations and offer assistance to Americans, if haply they will receive it at his hand. In his native land, Mr. Fick has received financial backing from the government, and has established a number of apartment houses where his scheme of a servantless existence is being tried by families who find it an agreeable change and a labor-saving contrivance. Any number of families may reside in an apartment house, if there are rooms and floors enough to give each a comfortable suite. There must be elevator service, dumb-waiters, telephones, and everything else that the modern apartment house offers its patrons. A common kitchen and a co-operative laundry do away with the need for servants. Breakfasts, luncheons and dinners are served promptly and punctually to every family, and there is not so much as the looking over a bill of fare. You have only to indicate the foods that you do not like and they will never be sent to you. At the ringing of an electric bell meals will be sent so appetizing in flavor and so daintily served that the most epicurean taste will be satisfied.

Of course, the people who shall adopt this plan of living must be prepared to pay for their luxury, although the rates are not to be beyond the means of many successful Americans. Every one in the house is expected to take stock in the enterprise to a modest amount, and no one will be accepted who does not give references as to character and financial ability. The scheme is rather interesting. It remains to be seen how it will work on this side the Atlantic.

A Girl's Tribute to Her Friend

From a parsonage in Kansas a ministerial friend has sent a very sweet poem written by his daughter in memory of her schoolmate and friend, Miss Josie Rockefellow Brice. The name of the youthful poet is Lillian Mancha, and her work shows a pure heart, true feeling and promise of development when she shall be older. We have not room to quote more than a stanza or two of the poem, which is long. Here is one:

I well remember how she looked when she became my bride.
And how her beauty stirred within my heart a wholesome pride.
Her slender form was graceful, and her face was smooth and fair;
Her rosy cheeks in charming contrast with her ebon hair.

Well, thirty years from that same day, we chanced again to be
In that same room, and vividly the scene came back to me;
But, oh, how greatly changed was she! the lines of grief and care
Were on her features, and the snows of winter in her hair!

So now I whispered: "Thirty years! And we are here again;
And, darling, you are thirty years more beautiful than then.
I loved you very ardently when we were married here,
But, sweetheart, my affection has been growing every year."

Great joy lit up her face, and then she whispered in my ear
The sweetest words a man this side of heaven's gate can hear!
And I have learned a most surprising truth, and it is this:
It takes just thirty years of married life to ripen bliss!

But why God's ways are not like ours, is not for us to know,
For when his reaper gathers flowers, the best are first to go.

Another, engraved on the tombstone of the dear girl, is as quaint and simple as some of the inscriptions in old cemeteries in New England:

Since, dearest Josie, thou hast gone the way we all must go,
To ask you back would be quite wrong: we shall not wish it so.

A Husband's Tribute After Thirty Years

A friend has sent us a very sweet little poem, full of the tender sentiment of love, that has held its own loyally through the vicissitudes of a happy married life. It will find an echo in thousands of hearts and homes. The author is the Rev. W. C. Martin, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Bluffton, Ind.:

MRS. C. VANDERBILT AND HER CHILDREN

IT would be difficult to find even among the royal families of Europe a queen more beautiful and children more bewitching than the group in our picture. Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt is a woman distinguished for beauty, breeding and personal charm, and her children are fine specimens of health and grace. The nurseries of rich women in America are unsurpassed in the palaces of the Old World, and motherhood among us wears a regal crown.

Changing the Scene

TWO friends were sitting together watching the set on a bright spring afternoon. One held i hand a letter. She opened it and, glancing the page, said, "This is from Mrs. Lynwood. Sh had two trips in the last six months, one to Montrea one to Mexico. Rich people may go where they wil do what they like. You and I have not had a ch of scene in six years and, so far as I am concerned, is no likelihood of my ever stirring out of this hous

"It is a pleasant house," her friend answered ge "You have a lovely view of the sunset from these windows, and pretty soon your garden will be the a ration of the town. One might be worse off than to to live here. It rests me just to cross your threshol sit in your living-room."

"Well," said the other, "you may be right, but gets tired of the same house and the same wall paper the same furniture and the same pe hang one's hat on, though they may be enough in their way. I like your hous situation ever so much better than this. are on higher ground and nearer the sta and you are much better off as regards lovely bath-room. Confess now, aren't even you, a wee bit tired of a home which you can seldom stir?"

The friend was silent. After a mon she spoke. The two had been sch mates and knew each other well. It quite like the old eager schoolgirl Kittie Martin had been, to make the p osition she did. "Lillian, what if change homes for a fortnight? You Jack and the children take my house, Henry and my children and I will t yours. We are both good housekee and we can trust one another to tak much care of the new abode that isn't l as of the old one that is. We shall h to pack trunks, but we would have to that were we going to Old Point Com or Palm Beach. This plan of mine give us a change of scene and a new look for two weeks. Each of us can how it seems to live at the other en town. Our husbands will at first opp the change. Men are quick to see ob tions, but we can persuade them to le try. What do you say?"

After a little talk, the two friends, could not afford to travel or enjoy a tant change of scene, agreed upon cha ing the situation by living each for a f night in the home of the other. The p proved successful. They enjoyed the home for the interval and returned wh the visit was over to discover each for h self that her home possessed advanta that the other lacked. The change not one that involved much labor, but really was wholesome and invigorating.

In one's own house, without moving at all, an agreeable change of scene n be had by simply leaving one room taking another. To some people a cha of furniture is restful. Most of us gr weary of monotony, and respond quick to variety.

Concerning Lost Children

Whenever a little child is lost, a ne of sympathy vibrates from end to end the land. Every heart aches at the thou of a helpless little one exposed to cold a hunger and countless perils, wanderi among strangers, while its own peop racked by terrible anxiety and madden by suspense, can find no clue to its whe abouts. If there be a suspicion of k napping, the deadly danger of the case is multipli a hundredfold, and it is not too much to say that million homes are penetrated with compassion for t one home that staggers beneath its burden of grief. T kidnapper is a miracle of human cruelty. One wond in what environment such a monster was reared. T children of the very rich are in more imminent peril th those of the poor where child-stealing is concerned, though it may sometimes happen that a child of remar able beauty will attract the hungry heart of some ha insane childless woman, who clutches at the treasu without thought of the home she is robbing. Provide tially, these instances of crime are rare, yet from time time a disappearance like that of little Horace Marvi in Delaware, startles and affrights the parental heart.

The S. S. "Buford" is Now Loaded and 40,000 of these 49-Pound Sacks of Flour Go to China by our Second Famine Ship, the "Logan"

ANOTHER $50,000 FOR CHINA'S NEED

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" CABLES THIS SUM TO HELP FEED THE SUFFERERS TILL THE "BUFORD" ARRIVES

HAT the famine situation in China is indeed a desperate one has been still convincingly demonrd during the past . Though working heroically to fight back the ne, the two Relief Committees, civic and missionary, ently realize their comparative helplessness in the of the great and overshadowing calamity. Even all the aid at their disposal—imperial and provinative and foreign—what they are accomplishing is more than a drop in the bucket. There are remote cts in Honan and elsewhere where vast hordes of ne sufferers are still unreached. While the peasant lation along the Canal and southward and west- are being systematically relieved, those distant rers must not be left to perish.

his was the determination of the Relief Committees, Secretary McCrea, of the Chinkiang Missionary d, on April 14, after consultation with his associates, ed to Dr. Klopsch:

Send all available funds immediately.

"McCrea."

was an unexpected call. An inquiry by the cable ght this additional message from etary McCrea:

"Chinkiang, April 16.

Several hundred thousand lives ady saved by foreign aid. Our mittee is enrolling thousands daily. nown multitudes in remote dis- s, however, are yet unrelieved and r condition constantly grows worse.

"McCrea."

n the same day the editor of the th China News cabled to The istian Herald from Shanghai that 00 able-bodied, destitute men are employed on the public works un by the government, and that number might be increased. The il distribution of relief supplies, he ed, was 260,000 bags of meal (prob- ten-pound bags), and 5,000 bushels wheat and potatoes. This system- relief, however, extended only to e near at hand, who were enrolled on the relief lists. Up to this time, owing to the pressure for relief in districts near at hand, apparently no effort had n made to reach the distant points of suffering, ough rumors had come of a grim tragedy being cted on a vast scale in those remote sections. It reported that the people, mad with hunger, were ng white clay, husks, and even the poisonous green n from the ponds, in a desperate effort to sustain . But it was futile, and the poor peasants, appar- y forsaken by the whole world, assumed the stoi- n of the true Oriental and bowed to their fate in nce. The dead lay around where they had fallen n the street, on the doorstep, or in the fields.

Responding to the Relief Committee's appeal, and in w of the urgency of the case, Dr. Klopsch immedi- y cabled another advance remittance of $50,000 n The Christian Herald Relief Fund. This will erially strengthen the hands of the Committees and give force and energy to their work until the arrival of the transport Buford with her great life-saving cargo of American flour. Before the eye of the reader rests upon these lines, this money will be doing its work in saving many lives and averting much misery. This latest remittance of $50,000, added to previous remittances of $150,000, and to the value of the Buford's cargo, $110,000, and the government's gift of free transportation, $40,000, brings the total for Chinese relief to date, exclusive of all other sources, to $350,000.

As the Buford cannot accommodate all the cargo of flour which has been provided by The Christian Herald, the Army Department has granted the services of a second transport, the Logan, to carry all the surplus cargo, which may be considerable. This generous provision by the government of a second famine relief ship comes unsolicited and will be warmly appreciated. The Logan will sail from the port of San Francisco for Chinkiang one week later than the Buford.

Flour-laden Boats of the Relief Committee on the Grand Canal

Letters just received from the famine field by The Christian Herald show that the relief system inaugurated by the Chinkiang Committee is working admirably. An important Chinese official has offered to place small steamers on the Grand Canal for the Committee's service, which will greatly assist in the quick transportation of supplies, cutting down the canal trip from thirty days to eight days, all stoppages included.

A sad confession of the Committee's inability to reach all the needy ones is made in this statement:

"The Relief Committee was able to secure enough milk for one depot to feed 100 babies until the harvest, with the result that about 100 more lives have been saved. The Committee, however, has been compelled to leave about 400 other babies in that district to die."

Immediately on the receipt of this pathetic news, the proprietor of The Christian Herald cabled instructions to the Missionary Committee to devote $5,000 of the latest remittance to making a special effort for saving the lives of the little helpless children in all the famine districts.

Rev. A. Sydenstricker, Corresponding Secretary of the Chinkiang Committee, writes:

There are now no less than five large centres from which relief work is being conducted. We consider relief works one of the best methods for helping the sufferers. The famine will not be finished at the beginning of harvest, say the first of June, though it will in some degree be somewhat mitigated in places before that time. A great deal of the wheat land, which is the principal crop in the famine district, was not sown last autumn, and in some places the people are already pulling up the young wheat for food.

Missionary H. J. Mungean, who is helping in relief work at Antung, a station of the China Inland Mission about 150 miles north of Chinkiang, writes that there are now two gangs of men—several hundred in all—filling a swamp and making and repairing roads:

The men receive five cash (one-half cent Mexican) per load. A man can make an average of 120 cash per day, and he and his family can get along on that. Each workman has a badge on his breast. We issue badges to the most needy and see that each workman has a flour ticket. So far the scheme works satisfactorily. We have the sympathy and practical assistance of the officials and gentry here. They are all very kind, and were it not for their co-operation, we could not manage this large number of men, a number which we are endeavoring to increase daily. . . . As yet we have had no time to inspect the north and northeastern part of the hsien (county), where we understand there is dire need. We have more than we can do to keep the work going here.

Secretary McCrea, of the Missionary Committee, writes, under date of Chinkiang, March 16:

I must try to thank you and the readers of The Christian Herald, in behalf of our missionaries and the suffering people, for your gracious and munificent gifts to our Committee, to be used in succoring China's starving people. Even we who see it cannot comprehend the awful suffering involved when millions are starving. Try to comprehend what this burden means to the missionary living in the midst of such woe, and then you can have some conception of the joy that was ours when the glad news was flashed over the wires from Consul-General Rodgers, a few days ago, that a large remittance had just been received from The Christian Herald. Our hearts overflowed with thankfulness to God for The Christian Herald and its readers, as we thought of the thousands whose lives shall now be saved from the horrors of death by starvation. May our heavenly Father's richest blessing be upon the world's greatest "famine-breaker."

Now I must tell you how we are using this money. Since the report which I sent you some days ago, we have made the following disbursements:

To the Missionaries at	Tsingkiangpu,	. .	$30,000
" " " "	Suchien,	. . .	20,000
" " " "	Hsuchowfu,	. . .	20,000
" " " "	Antung,	. . .	6,000
" " " "	Huaian,	. . .	5,000
Total,	. . . . .		$81,000

At Tsingkiangpu, they are beginning work on an important canal that has been silted up and will employ the farmers and other famine sufferers in clearing out the canal and thus minimizing the danger of another flood like the one of last summer which caused this famine. They will thus support the people until harvest.

At Antung the people are being employed in carrying dirt from the old bed of the Yellow River, the channel of which is higher than the city itself, to low places inside the city and filling them in. This work also will assist in preventing a repetition of floods. At consisting of reproductions from the popular Armour Calendar Girls—the Christy Girl, the Hutt Girl, the Gilbert Girl, the Peirce Girl, the Anderson Girl and the Fisher Girl—the complete set of six will be sent in exchange for 25 cents or metal cap (accompanied by 2 cents return postage), from jar of Armour's Extract of Beef, the best extract of the best beef.

Rich, meaty, wholesome, and palate-tempting soups—soups that nourish and delight, without overheating—are best made with Armour's Extract of Beef. It imparts a tempting aroma and flavor—gives zest and snap to every soup creation. Armour's Extract supplies that flavory, savory quality, without which soups are weak, watery, tasteless, and insipid, because it is the best extract of the best beef—a pure, wholesome concentrated stock packed in convenient jars for household use. It is invaluable to the housewife not only as a rich and appetizing addition to soups, sauces and gravies, but in restoring the original juices and flavor to recooked meats, and giving vegetables a snap and flavor obtained in no other way. There's no substitute for Armour's Extract of Beef. It stands alone—"the best extract of the best beef."

Every jar is sealed with the U. S. inspection stamp that guarantees it to be extract of beef.

"CULINARY WRINKLES," our little cook book written by Mrs. Ida M. Palmer, tells of scores of appetizing ways in which Armour's Extract may be used. It will be mailed on request.

Joseph Forgives His Brothers

International Sunday School Lesson for May 12
*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

TEACHERS will do well to read the beautiful and simple Bible story of Joseph's dealing with his brethren. Those who lack time or inclination for such reading may find help in the following paraphrase of the narrative presented in fourteen word-pictures:

First Picture. The whole land of Egypt is dry and parched. The much-prized leeks, onions and cucumbers are nowhere to be had. It is the second year of the famine. The rural population have largely moved into the cities, particularly those who were not provident in the storing of grain during the seven years of plenty. They obtain food from the storehouses filled by Joseph, now ruler of Egypt.

The Brothers Tested

Second Picture. The land of Canaan is also famine-stricken, and the father and brothers of Joseph are in danger of starvation. Jacob tells his ten sons that they must go down to Egypt and buy grain.

Third Picture. The ten brothers come into the presence of the ruler of Egypt, and bow to the ground before him, not recognizing in him their brother Joseph. Joseph recognizes them, but gives no sign. He accuses them of being spies that he may test them, and find what sort of men they have grown to be in the twenty-two years since he has seen them. In protest they tell their family history, referring to Joseph as "one who is not," and also speak of their younger brother at home with his aged father.

Fourth Picture. The ruler of Egypt tests his brothers still further by having them put in prison for three days, and then telling them he will consider them true men and not spies, if they will consent to one of their number being left in the prison until they shall return to their home and come again to Egypt bringing with them their youngest brother. They reason with each other in their own tongue, Hebrew, not knowing that Joseph is hearing and understanding every word; that their present sad condition is a punishment for the cruel way in which they treated their brother Joseph.

Conscience at Work

Fifth Picture. Simeon is left bound in the prison while the nine brothers are allowed to depart with their sacks filled with grain which they have purchased.

Sixth Picture. Having proceeded on their journey they stop at a wayside inn to rest, and open their sacks to get food for themselves and their asses. The first one to open his sack discovers the money he had paid for the grain. They scent a conspiracy to prove that they are indeed spies.

Seventh Picture. They reach Canaan and tell their aged father what has befallen them in Egypt, and about the detention of Simeon until they should return to Egypt bringing their brother Benjamin with them. Jacob wails with grief, saying: "Joseph is not and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away."

Jacob's Trial

Eighth Picture. The grain which they had brought from Egypt being exhausted, Jacob urges his sons to prepare for another expedition. They hold a council with their father, telling him that it is useless to go without taking Benjamin with them. Their starting is delayed by the unwillingness of the father to let Benjamin go. He finally consents.

Ninth Picture. Joseph sees them as they approach and rejoices in his heart to see Benjamin with them, but still gives no sign of recognition. Joseph orders a dinner prepared for them in his own house.

"I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt"

Tenth Picture. In fear and trembling the brothers come to the ruler's house. They interview the steward concerning the money put in their sacks on their last visit. He treats them kindly and restores Simeon to them.

Eleventh Picture. Joseph comes in to feast with them, inquires after their father, receives the youngest brother, but still does not make himself known, accepts the present they have brought, and then retires. But still the test is not complete.

Joseph's Stratagem

Twelfth Picture. The men's sacks are again filled with grain, and they depart for Canaan, but are quickly followed by a servant of the ruler, who declares that they have stolen a silver cup. They protest against it, and begin to open their sacks, declaring that the man in whose sack it is found shall be killed, and the cup is found in Benjamin's sack.

Thirteenth Picture. The brothers return to the house of the ruler, who brings against Benjamin the accusation of having stolen his cup, and the ruler proposes making Benjamin his slave, while the others are free to return to their homes. But Judah, the very one who had proposed selling Joseph as a slave, now offers to be made a slave in the place of Benjamin, because Benjamin is the child of his father's old age. And he pleads for the release of Benjamin.

Fourteenth Picture. Joseph can no longer refrain from making himself known to his brothers; he therefore orders all attendants to leave the room. He bursts

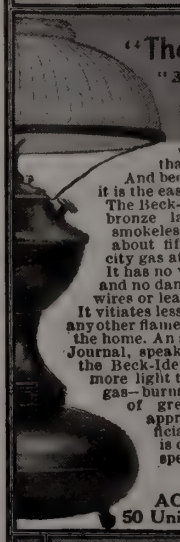
"BECK-IDEN



"The Perfect Light"
"3 Hours More Daylight for 1 Cent.
Don't you often long for just a little more daylight? The only artificial light which approaches daylight that of The Beck-Iden Lamp. And because it is nearest to daylight it is the easiest on the eyes.
The Beck-Iden is a handsome, portable bronze lamp; clean, odorless and smokeless. It burns gas; and gives about fifteen times more light than city gas at four-sevenths the cost.
It has no wick, oil, mantle or chimney and no dangers, like oil lamps, crossed wires or leaky pipes.
It vitiates less air and makes less heat than any other flame light. The "Perfect Light" for the home. An article in Feb'y Ladies Home Journal, speaking of the gas generated by the Beck-Iden Lamp says: "Gives much more light than an equal amount of city gas—burns with a steady, white flame of great brilliancy—the nearest approach to sunlight of any artificial illuminant." This praise is due to merit only. We have a special proposition to make you.

It had evidently been a struggle and the savage had been overcome. Shall we who have not the African king's habits and customs to overcome be less brave? Shall not we forgive our enemies for Christ's sake that we may be like him?

Between John the Almoner, the renowned Bishop of Constantinople, and Nicetas, a nobleman, some bitter words had passed one day and they parted in anger. Although he had been wronged, as the day was drawing to its close John remembered the words of the apostle: "Be ye angry and sin not; let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Eph. 4:26). He sent a friend to Nicetas with the message: "My lord, the sun is going down." Nicetas understood, hastened to him, and they reconciled themselves cheerfully before the sun set.

Two Captains Reconciled

A gentleman once told Sir Eardley Wilmot about an injury that had been done to him by an opponent. After describing all the circumstances, he said: "Don't you think that I ought to resent and expose it? Wouldn't that be the most manly course?" "Yes," answered Sir Eardley, "it would certainly be the most manly course to resent it, but it would be godlike to forgive it."

In the following story we see how grudges give way in sublime moments: Captain Rankin of the Galatea hated Captain Frazier of the Norwalk, a rival boat, and Captain Frazier hated him in return. They were once out in a violent storm, in which the Galatea had her shaft broken. The ile Stanley the explorer was in da, he was well treated by Mtesa, ing of that country. Stanley had conversations with him and explained n the principles of Christianity, dwell- ecially on that which was the hardest n African chief to apprehend—the of forgiving an enemy. At this very Mtesa was at war with the Wavuma ad in captivity an old chief of that whom he proposed to burn alive.

Stanley shook his head. esa, you are no Christian," he said; talk as a pagan. It is not Mtesa good who speaks, but Mtesa the bar- n and the savage." But the king d not listen. He ordered the fagots ght and his prisoner to be bound and among them. Stanley rose. "Listen," id. "The white man speaks once more only once. If you kill that poor old , I will leave you and never return. I go through the white man's land, and tell everywhere that Mtesa is a savage, will say what a wicked thing I saw a do." So saying Stanley walked . An hour afterward Mtesa sent for He said, "Mtesa is a Christian. He ships came within hailing distance. "Shall we speak the Norwalk, sir?" asked the second officer. "Not if we can help it," responded the skipper. But the Norwalk raised a signal asking, "What's the trouble?" Then the Galatea signaled the reply, "Shaft broken — unmanageable." "Shall I take off your passengers and crew?" asked the Norwalk. "Can't tell yet," was the reply. The next sentence that glimmered from the Norwalk's mast ran, "I'll stand by until the morning —subject to your command." The next night the two rivals rode into port together, the disabled Galatea being towed by the Norwalk. After their passengers and cargoes had been discharged, Captain Rankin walked over to the Norwalk's pier, where Captain Frazier was giving orders. "Goin' up town, Fraz?" he asked. "B'lieve I am, Rankin," answered Frazier. And the two grizzled sea-dogs, who had not spoken in years, strolled up town, arm in arm. By mere brute strength or the adroit use of weapons we may conquer an enemy, and compel him to sue for pardon or mercy, but how much greater is the achievement of turning an enemy into a friend!

Joseph not only forgave the injury he had suffered, but tried to make it easy for his brothers to forgive themselves. He told them his coming to Egypt was providential. He thus showed his magnanimity.

Nothing has ever been devised to equal life insurance. It is the easiest, fairest, safest way for the man who is of use to others to extend that usefulness beyond his lifetime with them. INTO STILL WATERS a sleepless night, however, and many an anxious day; and the way by the room where lay the woolly dog in the sunshine became quite worn with the frequent passing of the doctor's feet. At last one day the blue eyes of the sick woman opened and turned upon him, rational, questioning, displeased.

"You are a physician?"

"Yes, Mrs. Kendall. My name is Spencer."

"Who sent for you?"

"Your faithful servant first. Afterwards I came of my own accord, because it was necessary."

"But I forbade her to do it."

"And she obeyed—until you were so ill she had to call me."

The golden head on the pillow stirred restlessly.

"She should not have done it, even then."

"But, my dear Mrs. Kendall, you were desperately ill. You might have died."

There was a slight pause; then a low, distinct voice came from the bed.

"That is exactly why she should not have done it—I might have died."

For the first shocked instant the young man made no reply; then his lips parted, only to close again as quickly. The next moment his whole expression had changed.

"If you'll drink this now, please, Mrs. Kendall," he said cheerily, "then I'll be going."

Three minutes later he softly crossed the room and opened the hall door.

CHAPTER VIII

AS early as possible in Mrs. Kendall's convalescence the doctor was told that his services were no longer required. The trained nurse, too, was dismissed, and once more the silence of the darkened halls and chambers was undisturbed. To Houghtonsville things seemed as of old; to Dr. Spencer they did not. Always now before his mental gaze was a slender, black-gowned figure with sad blue eyes, and always not far away was a little woolly dog with the sunlight upon it.

So vivid was all this to his mind's eye that for a moment he still thought it a vision, when one day in New York he saw the same slender black-gowned young woman in the Grand Central Station. The next minute he had crossed to the woman's side.

"Good afternoon, Mrs. Kendall. You are going home? May I not be of some assistance to you?"

"Thank you, no, Dr. Spencer. I am not going home at present."

Voice and manner were a cold dismissal, and the doctor had no choice but to lift his hat and walk away; but he did not go far. Three times during the next half-hour he passed through the waiting-room, and each time he saw nothing but the black-gowned woman sitting alone on one of the seats. The fourth time he entered the room he crossed once more to her side.

"Mrs. Kendall, I beg of you—you are not strong yet—will you not let me take you home?"

"I am quite well, doctor. I need no assistance, and I am not ready to go home. Surely, I do not need to say more!"

There was a moment's silence, then the doctor raised his chin.

"I understand, Mrs. Kendall, of course. Yet in the face of that I am going to make one more effort to save you from yourself. You can do no possible good by remaining here, and you are only bringing additional suffering to yourself and your friends. Will you not come with me?"

The woman stirred restlessly.

"Dr. Spencer, you must know that you are annoying me. Why do you persist? There is no one that can be injured by my doing as I please. There is no one that has a right to interfere."

"I am not so sure of that," said the man gently. "I have found that no one lives to himself alone."

"You are right," returned the woman with sudden bitterness. "They are not alone. No one is as I am. Look there, and there and there," she continued in a low, tense voice, glancing from one to another of the groups about them; "they have children, one—two—even four or five. I had a child once, doctor—one little ewe lamb, and she was taken from me. Now I have not even a grave to weep over. Even that is denied me; and yet you would take from me the one poor comfort I have left! This is my Margaret's grave, the place where I caught the last glimpse of my darling's face. It is my right to come here. It is my right to grieve as I please. Now will you go?"

There was no tremor in the low voice, no sob; there was only the concentrated bitterness of long years of silent rebellion. Never before had Mrs. Kendall so bared her heart to any human eye.

"Yes, I will go," said the man, gravely, after a moment; then he held out his hand. "Forgive me for my unwelcome intrusion on your grief, Mrs. Kendall; and believe me, there is no one in the whole wide world that so deeply sympathizes with you. If at any time I can be of any service to you I shall be only too glad. Good afternoon and good-bye."

India Orphans Helping China

MISS MARGARET J. MORROW, a missionary of the Rakha Girls' Orphanage, Fatehgarh, India, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

It may be interesting to you and many of the friends who helped in the famine in India to know that some of those helped are adding their gifts to help China in her time of need.

This week's mail brought THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with the sad news of the suffering multitudes. I told the girls, a large proportion of whom are famine orphans. Many eyes filled with tears as they heard of the poor children and ruined homes because of hunger. I told them to decide if there was anything they could do, and less than three hours after they brought their report. A goodly number—over seventy—had been doing extra cooking, grinding, water-drawing, sweeping, etc., thus, from time to time, earning a few pice, their object being to earn enough to buy a nice calico frock for church. Some had about gained their purpose, but they all said that they would keep none of it, and all asked me to send the full amount to China.

At first they decided to give up one meal a day, but have since decided to give up their meat, for a time at least, and asked that the money which goes to the butcher be sent to China. They denied themselves one meal yesterday; that money will go also. The children's contribution now amounts to Rs. 63, or $21. The teachers in the school have also given to the cause cheerfully and freely. Our Indian Christian Church is asking to be allowed to add its offering. One of the little villages has also sent Rs. 3 annas 12, or $1.25, and I hope we may hear from more as they come to know of the need.

The Crusade Against Profanity

The Rev. Roland D. Sawyer, of Haverhill, Mass., has just issued a five years' report of the crusade against swearing. In that campaign 400,000 pieces of literature have been circulated, 120 meetings held, and various addresses given before churches and conferences. The Anti-Profanity League now has a membership of 18,000, and 125 auxiliary societies. This is the movement which Mr. Sawyer organized in the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and which was five years ago introduced to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers through these columns, and largely through that introduction was extended to fifty-four States and Provinces in the United States and Canada. The organization is equipped with literature, badges and regulations, and furnishes an easy and practical method of combating the evil of profanity.

Huaian work will be done on canals and dykes with the same twofold purpose in view, that of giving the starving people work that will help to protect their homes in the future.

At Suchien, relief works have been going on for some time and the missionaries will be unable to enlarge them. The money we have just sent will be used in buying food for the people. This remittance will be a godsend to thousands who are starving where there is food to be bought, but who have nothing with which to buy. The missionaries will examine all families who are enlisted and will do their best to prevent unworthy people from getting help. Conditions are fearful at Suchien, and I rejoice to think of the good the $20,000 will do that we have just sent them.

At Hsuchowfu conditions are about the same as at Suchien. A number of missionaries have come down from Shantung Province to help them and they are going into the country, listing the starving families and giving them food and money.

There is one general rule, which is being applied to all the work at every station. We are taking on the lists as many people as this money will support, continuously, until harvest. In forwarding this money to the missionaries I have asked them to let me know as soon as their lists are completed how many people we are going to be able to keep until harvest. As soon as I get these statistics, I will forward them to you. This last remittance means that many thousands are going to be carried safely over this fearful spring. As more money comes we will be able to take on more people. So that every dollar that is sent now means the giving of the life-bringing food to more dying people. We all feel the wisdom of this plan.

Associated Press cablegrams from China represent the famine as "exceeding in horror the great famine of India," and adds that "hundreds are dying every day, disease striking down the sufferers like a plague." Death to hundreds of thousands would seem to be inevitable, unless abundant relief is provided. United States Consul-General Rodgers, at Shanghai, cables that seven weeks must elapse before the present destitution can be ameliorated by any harvest.

A Shanghai dispatch states that 500,000 famine sufferers have now been enrolled on the Committee's relief lists and are being provided for until harvest. They represent 90,000 families. Free food tickets are given where the family is absolutely destitute. Those who are able are given work. To other families, an allowance of one and one-half cents per day is made for each person, and tickets are given them entitling them to buy food at cost.

All contributions should be addressed to CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Fund, 92 Bible House, New York. Every contribution, however small, will be acknowledged. Recent contributions are acknowledged elsewhere in this issue.

Gospel Need in Bulgaria

To worship in a church which threatens at any time to collapse and bury the congregation is decidedly unpleasant. Such is the condition of the only Protestant church in Sofia, Bulgaria, of which an English visitor said recently: "If in London, this building long ago, would have been condemned as unsafe." In addition to its insecurity, some alterations are made necessary by the growth of the work. $7,000 are required to make the house of worship secure, and to afford the necessary enlargement.

It was Pastor Popoff's purpose to raise this sum among his own people. To this end he repeatedly appealed to them for two years, and out of their poverty they nobly responded. Thus he has secured from them $2,781. Among the donors of this sum is Prince Ferdinand, who contributed forty dollars and expressed a high appreciation of the work of the church.

Seeing it would be impossible to get the needed funds from his own people, Pastor Popoff has lately visited Christians in England and America, and appealed to them for aid. He has thus far raised $1,381. Among the donors in New York are Messrs. George W. Wickersham, John S. Kennedy, and Miss Grace H. Dodge, $100 each; James McGraw, $50; Cleveland Dodge, Rev. D. Stewart Dodge, John S. Huyler, A. C. James, and Mrs. M. A. Blair, $25 each. $2,766 are still lacking to complete the necessary amount for repairing the church. Pastor Popoff invites the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to aid him in this worthy effort, and thus enable him to return to his work, which is greatly suffering in his absence. Contributions for this object may be sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, marked "Sofia Church."

Patriotic Memorials at Valley Forge

A NEW interest is developing for the pilgrim to Valley Forge, in the form of additions to the Memorial Church erected on the spot where Washington knelt in prayer. The "Cloisters of the Colonies," intended to be a memorial by all the States whose sons participated in the stirring scenes around the encampment, are now a visible part of the chapel. The first to be erected was that of the State of New Jersey. Cut in the structural stone is the following inscription:

> To the Glory of God and in appreciation of the Patriotism and Devotion of the Soldiers of New Jersey in the War of the Revolution, and in Loving Memory of Stille Chew and Rebecca D. Turner, his wife, of Woodbury, N. J., this Bay is Erected by Sarah R. Chew, 1905.

The second bay is that representing the Keystone State and is the gift of Mr. T. Broom Belfield, of Philadelphia. It is similarly inscribed.

Granite and Indiana limestone are the materials used in the construction of these bays. The ceilings are of carved oak, embellished with the arms of the various States. The floors are of Tennessee marble, and set in the centre of each is the colonial seal in bronze.

Memorial pews will soon be placed in the building and dedicated with suitable exercises. They are handsome pews of quartered oak, and on each is a brass plate inscribed with the name and giving the particulars of the hero in whose honor they are placed in the chapel. The chapel itself, as well as the memorials, is the result of a national desire to preserve the spot where Washington prayed for victory in his darkest hour.

The New Memorial Chapel at Valley Forge

The porch of the chapel was built by All Saints' Sunday School, Norristown. An inscription is cut in the wall, the language used being from the General Orders at Valley Forge, in which Washington revealed the religious side of his character in these words:

> While we are zealously performing the duties of good citizens and soldiers, we certainly ought not to be inattentive to the higher duties of religion. To the distinguished character of patriot it should be our highest glory to add the more distinguished character of Christian.

An inscription on the opposite wall is taken from Washington's Farewell Address.

Many interesting relics of Washington are being donated to the care of the rector, Rev. W. Herbert Burk.

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. J. H. Hale died at her home in Greene County, Tenn., on December 27, 1906, aged fifty-three years. A good wife, a good mother, a good Christian has gone to her eternal rest.

On November 6, 1906, Mrs. J. W. Peck, of Watertown, N. Y., passed away at Dayton, Ohio, in her eighty-seventh year. She had been spared to celebrate the fifty-third anniversary of their wedding-day by the side of her aged husband. Mrs. Peck was a life-long member of the Methodist Church.

Mrs. Emily Cauright died suddenly at her home in Jeppa, Mich., at the age of sixty-two years, leaving two sons and a daughter in sore bereavement. Mrs. Cauright was an earnest, active Christian during her life.

Mrs. H. E. Everett of Kinsman, Ohio, died May 6, 1906, in her sixty-seventh year. She had been a subscriber for The Christian Herald for twenty years and had often been a contributor to its many relief funds. Early in youth she became a member of the Methodist Church.

William Jones of Clare, Mich., died recently at the age of sixty-eight years. A beloved husband and father, a faithful friend and helper to all in need, a wise and kindly counselor, Mr. Jones was one of God's servants from youth to ripe old years.

Rowena R., widow of Leonard C. Cook, died at her home in Kilbury, Me., on March 21, 1906, aged seventy-seven years. She is survived by six sons and one daughter. Earnest and fervent in her devotion to the cause of God, she "endured" through a long illness, she sleeps in Jesus.

Miss Jennie Hall, of Fraser, Mich., went to heaven on the sixth of February. On the fourteenth, her aged mother followed so that they two are together in eternity, as to life. The Christian Herald has lost in Mrs. Hall and her daughter two faithful friends who have read every copy since the inception of the paper.

One of the oldest members of The Christian Herald family, known as "Aunt Sally," Mission of White Sulphur Springs, Va., passed to her rest from Brooklyn, N. Y., on March 9, aged 4 score years. A mourning friend testifies that next to her Bible, "Aunt Sally" loved The Christian Herald.

Died on August 7, 1906, at Norristown, Pa., Mrs. Ann Von Dorn, aged ninety years. She was a subscriber to The Christian Herald for many years, loved to read its pages and looking eagerly for its coming. She was blessed with a bright mind, retaining her faculties to the last, even in the midst of her sufferings. She died in the full assurance of the Christian's faith. She was a devout member of the Reformed Church since early womanhood.

Mrs. Amelia A. Duncan, who for many years prized The Christian Herald next to her Bible, went home on February 24, aged ninety-nine years, six months. She lived in Port Gibson, Miss., most of her life, removing to Little Rock, Ark., nineteen years ago. Wherever illness or sorrow called for Christian love and sympathy, there this disciple of practical religion was always to be found. Her children and friends are grateful for the bright and shining light of her life among them.

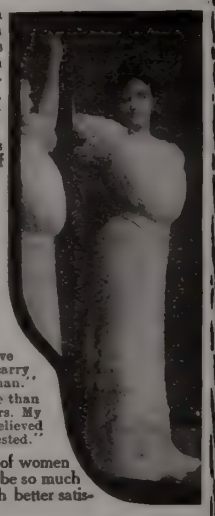
A Noble Christian Life Ended

ON the morning of April 1, 1907, from her residence in Pasadena, Calif., the spirit of Mrs. Collie Fox, wife of Mahlon D. Stambach, passed from time to eternity. Mrs. Stambach, born on March 9, 1851, was still in the early afternoon of life. After a childhood passed in Cincinnati, Ohio, at sixteen years of age she became a member of the Presbyterian Church, with which she was closely allied until her death. Married to Mr. Stambach twenty years ago, their home was in Anchorage, Ky., and only recently the family settled in California.

The dominant note in the whole life of this consecrated woman has been to attain an ever closer union with the Master whom she so consistently served. What loss to Mrs. Stambach been but the entering into her rightful inheritance of surpassing joy, as a sore bereavement to the devoted husband, children and friends who are left to mourn her departure! Keenly interested in every cause which has for its object the uplift of humanity, she was moved to specific labor in sending the Gospel to India, especially by means of the Zenana, on behalf of the Child Widows conducted by Pandita Ramabai.

The Christian Herald endures a personal loss in the removal to its reward of a friend, Mrs. Stambach. She has been for years a generous contributor to its world-wide charities, and in full accordance with the many worthy causes which it has presented from time to time. It has been a privilege to receive the assurance of her fellowship.

Are You Too Thin?



For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give you, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not?

The following are extracts from the weekly reports of my pupils:

"Just think, Miss Cocroft, I have gained 25 pounds."

"Before I took up your work, I could not eat anything without the greatest distress, and now I think I can digest tacks. I am so happy."

"Every exercise and movement has accomplished just what we wanted."

"My bust, neck and chest have filled out beautifully and I carry myself like another woman."

"You have done more for me than doctors have done in 20 years. My constipation is entirely relieved and my nerves are so rested."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much more attractive and so much better satisfied with yourself.

I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

Time a Trust*

THAT our time, like our opportunities, is a trust, is the uniform teaching of all the Bible writers. It is not ours to do with as we choose, but is to be held sacred to the mission committed to us, and an accounting will be made of what we have done with it. That accounting will be sudden, as Christ warns us, and will be conducted on righteous principles. The Christian is a son, but he is also a servant, with the obligation of both relations, his sonship being a service of love freely rendered, and so much the more devoted because of the privileges he enjoys. Time is the opportunity in which the capital of ability conferred by our Lord may be employed, so that when he comes and takes account of his servants, we may render it with joy and not with shame.

This consideration does not require that our whole time is to be spent in preaching. The way is not open to all for that office, nor does Christ give to all the ability that that work demands. The way some Christians must spend their time is in secular work. In some cases a widowed mother and dependent brothers and sisters must be provided for. In other cases the character of a man's mental abilities points to commercial or mechanical pursuits. But in these cases valuable service may be rendered. The world needs to see that a lawyer or a merchant can lead a Christian life. When it sees a man eminent in worldly pursuits active in Christ's service, it concludes that the disinterested service must be genuine. So Christ will be served and his approval will be given as conspicuously as that he gives to his faithful ministers.

The point to be remembered is that time is short and precarious. What is to be done should be done at once and done quickly. The opportunity of speaking a word for Christ to some one in sorrow, to some one undergoing temptation, to some discouraged Christian, should never be postponed to a more convenient season, but should be spoken immediately, lest the opportunity pass and never return.

Piety in Adversity†

ONE of the most romantic stories of the Bible is that of Joseph, and it is one that a young man may wisely make his model. A true son, a magnanimous brother and a faithful servant, he is in all respects a pattern of high character.

In his early home he was placed in circumstances of extreme difficulty. His father's injudicious favoritism made him an object of envy to his brothers, even his dress emphasizing Jacob's invidious regard. His own simple, frank disposition increased the trouble. A shrewder, more prudent mind would have kept his dreams secret, but he freely told them at a time when dreams were regarded as auguries and portents. Thus the envy of his brothers increased until it became murderous.

In slavery his conduct was singularly noble. Some natures would have become sullen under the circumstances; but he was so devoted, so conscientious and trustworthy that Potiphar made him his steward and gave him control of all his possessions. Then came the fierce temptation before which many a young man would have fallen; but Joseph is true to his master and to his God. In prison Joseph might have thought, as many smarting under unjust punishment have thought, that it did not pay to be good, that God did not care what happened to the righteous. But Joseph is not cast down.

Summoned before Pharaoh he takes no credit for interpreting the dreams which puzzled the king's professional advisers. It is God, he says, who has showed Pharaoh what he will do. Promoted to the highest rank in the most highly civilized land then existing, he takes the wisest measures and so skilfully conducts negotiations with the people that he causes them to acknowledge an obligation to the government that renders them loyal subjects for all time. Nor does his elevation make him oblivious of family ties. His brothers, after their testing, are freely forgiven, and they and their families share in his prosperity.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Singular Life

THE works of Lafcadio Hearn, principally his Japan, an Interpretation, and his Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan, have thrown many side lights on the Island Empire, and the recent publication of his own life and letters, written and arranged by his friend, Elizabeth Bisland, not only reveals a very unusual character, but throws a still more marvelous illumination on the strange remoteness of the Japanese. Hearn's father was an Irish soldier, a surgeon-general in the British army, who fell in love with and married, under romantic circumstances, a beautiful Greek girl on an island of the Ionian Sea. Their first child, Lafcadio, was named for the island. The marriage did not turn out happily, and the parents were early separated. The boy was brought up by a relative of his father, and he seems never to have seen either his parents or his only brother after early childhood. While a lad at school he suffered an injury which resulted in the loss of one eye, and for the rest of his life he was handicapped by impaired vision. Extremely sensitive, the disfigurement caused by this accident, added to his small stature, which was five feet three, augmented a natural sensitiveness and helped to make difficult his intercourse with men.

A child of vivid imagination, a dreamer of dreams, an admirer of beauty, every possible mistake appears to have been made by those who trained him, so that in some measure the hatred of the true religion and misunderstanding of Christianity peculiar to his maturity are explained. At nineteen, poor and friendless, the boy drifted into the great world of New York. To think of one so gifted with genius, so needing encouragement, in this great maelstrom, without a hand to help him or a home to make him welcome, is heartbreaking. He found employment of a sort not more than enough to keep soul and body together, and later made his way to the West. En route to Cincinnati, he had money enough for the railway fare, but not enough to pay for meals, and he recalls the gentle act of a girl, an immigrant from Norway, beautiful as a dream, who divined his plight and his hunger and delicately slipped a piece of brown bread and a thick slice of cheese into his hand as the evening dusk gathered. In the West he became a journalist, and in time, by one or another stage of progress, got himself to New Orleans, where his real literary life began. He made a constant and painstaking study of French writers, especially Theophile Gautier and Pierre Loti. The infinite patience and strenuous self-denial of his life can hardly be told, but little by little he won out from excessive poverty and began to be known as a writer of translations, a contributor of the Times-Democrat of New Orleans, and the author of some exquisite stories and sketches that appeared in literary magazines at the North.

Years passed, and he went to Japan, sent there by a publishing house that he might write in his own peerless manner of the land of which America was then taking note, not indeed for the first time, but with renewed and more inquisitive interest. The year is May, 1890. He was destined never to return from the East. He remained there until September, 1904, when death concluded a career that had its side of brilliant success, much like a gleam of gold set against clouds of midnight blackness.

Although few men in our time have been able to write in a fashion so picturesque, to make pages that are themselves glorious visions of color and light, to catch so miraculously the spirit of an alien civilization, the material results of his work were meagre and disappointing. He wrote slowly. He never made much money, and he found himself compelled, in order to carry the burdens that he sifted to his shoulders, to take up the work of a school-master. He taught in government schools and his salary supported not merely himself and his lovely Japanese wife, but her family to its uttermost degree, as is the custom in Japan. From nine to thirteen people became dependent upon him through his marriage. That his wife might not lose her citizenship, Mr. Hearn gave up his allegiance as a British subject and became a Japanese citizen, taking the name of his wife's family. Never in the least degree comprehending the spirit of the true religion of Christ, he became a Buddhist, hated our missionaries and in every detail idealized what he saw in Japan, especially what he thought he saw in the temple worship. Only when his little son was born, we find the father's heart longing that the training of the West might be given to him. The whole story is fascinating and curious. The man's character is exceedingly generous and charming. He adored his friends and was ready at any moment to sacrifice himself and whatever he possessed.

When Mr. Hearn undertook the office of schoolmaster, he gave to it the whole of his powers and found the Japanese boys very responsive and extremely eager to learn. He put on record, however, the singular fact that as the boys became more highly educated they became more difficult for a European to understand. There were subtleties and intricacies that even he could not penetrate. Yet he found in his Japanese home a great deal of comfort. He adopted the dress and customs of the nation so far as he could, sitting and eating on the floor, as his new family did, and using a high chair and table only when he wrote. The relation between him and his wife was devoted and full of contentment for him and passionate affection for her. She belonged to an old aristocratic family, who had become impoverished, and her recollections of her husband, quoted by the author of the life, are very sweet and tender.

Questions arise in our minds as we read such a memoir. How far did heredity account for the curious contrasts in Hearn's life? On the mother's side there was a pagan strain. On the father's the traditions were Roman Catholic. There was a hint of gipsy blood on the father's side, and in the open palms of Lafcadio Hearn's hands there was the print of a thumb, said to be seen wherever there is gipsy lineage. He had the gipsy's insatiable love of wandering; some inward force forever made him restless and drove him from place to place. He had his Greek mother's love of the southland and was more like her people than like his kindred in Great Britain.

Probably, however, the unfortunate estrangement of his parents and their separation threw a gloom over his entire life. He must have been ill-taught or mistaught in that receptive childhood of his, or he would not have been so fatally perverted from the truth. Those splendid gifts might have been pledged to Jesus Christ and not to idolatry, had Lafcadio Hearn had around him the right influences in childhood. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

If You Are Deaf—Read Thi

That "truth is stranger than fiction" is most forcibly illustrated in the case of Mr. Geo. P. Way, for many years the electrical engineer of the Detroit Y.M.C.A., in the accidental discovery he made of a scientific principle, through the application of which his lost hearing was completely restored.

For 25 years Mr. Way was a deaf man, unable to hear his wife's voice across the table, unable to enjoy an active part in social life. For him, as for every deaf person, life was a gloomy, individual matter. He was so deaf he could scarcely hear the roar of his engines and dynamos. For ten years he carried an ear trumpet and had tried every device known; had almost constantly been under medical treatment in the vain effort to get back his hearing. To-day he hears perfectly; yet when he removes two tiny devices from his ears, he is quite as badly off as before—he is again deaf. The story of his discovery, which restored his hearing, is remarkable.

As Mr. Way tells it, he was at his post in the dynamo room one day, and as the buzzing in his ears bothered him more than usual, he placed a curiously shaped tuft of waste in his right ear. Immediately—in the midst of the silence that is the misery of one shut off from the sounds of the busy world—there came a crashing sound, and Mr. Way bounded across the room terror-stricken. Unconsciously he pulled the tuft of waste from his ear. Instantly he returned to the silence that had enveloped him for years. The sound of the machinery came to him as far away. Then he realized truth: he had found a scientific principle wh would give him back his hearing. For five year experimented constantly to put his accidental covery to practical use. He studied the construc of the human ear from every standpoint. At complete success crowned his efforts. The Ear Drum was the result, and it restored hearing. Others heard of the marvel, and he overwhelmed with requests for the little devices

Fraternal Magnanimity

By Mrs. M. Baxter

NOTHING happens by chance. Neither natural law nor circumstances, nor people are supreme. All things serve Him. And yet how few act as though this were so! How few see the hand of God in all that happens!

Joseph was one of the few. He was loyal to God, and did not, even under the greatest proving, misunderstand his God. Since the time of Abraham, God had not been able to reveal himself to man or through man as he had done in that "father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4:11). But Joseph served His purpose in manifesting in his own life the heart of God towards his ungrateful and rebellious creatures.

All countries came to Egypt to Joseph to buy corn (Gen. 41: 57), and thus it came to pass that Joseph's brethren, amongst others, came also, and he saw the dreams of his youth fulfilled when "they bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth" (Gen. 43: 6). But Joseph had been too long in the school of God to yield to the natural impulse which might lead him to make himself known to them either from the selfish joy of meeting again with his kith and kin, or from the self-justification in which he might have exulted now that his dreams were fulfilled, or any other motive which was simply carnal and selfish. To a man of faith, everything is seen in the light of God; he knows "no man after the flesh" (II. Cor. 5:16). What was God's purpose in permitting his brethren to come? How might he best serve God and serve them? Such were the thoughts in Joseph's heart. He had been schooled of God, and taught of God; he also in his turn schooled his brethren while they were all unconscious of what was taking place. Whether they would or not, consciously or unconsciously, Joseph's brethren must of necessity have to do with God when they came in contact with Joseph.

Joseph knew his brethren; he had not ceased to love them, and the eyes of love are very quick; perhaps he had long been on the lookout for them. But they knew not Joseph, and he made himself strange to them, accused them of being spies, put them in prison, and then told them that he feared God, and sent them away to fetch Benjamin, while he kept Simeon bound, and declared that they should not see his face unless they brought Benjamin with them. All this might seem to be malicious severity; but God was working with Joseph, and his purpose was accomplished; for these men were brought under conviction of sin, and said to one another: "We are verily guilty concerning our brother" (Gen. 43: 21). But the time was not yet when their suffering might be alleviated.

They left Egypt, but found on their homeward journey, to their discomfort and not to their joy, that their money was enclosed in their sacks of corn; and when they reached home and related all that had occurred, their poor old father was filled with dismay, and said, "All these things are against me" (Gen. 43 : 36).

The time came when hunger drove them back to Egypt, and it was with the utmost reluctance and ill-will that Jacob surrendered his beloved Benjamin. Joseph's brethren left a broken-hearted father to face a stern ruler of Egypt, without whose help death stared them and their families in the face. With fear and apprehension the brethren drew near, but with surprise they found themselves received as honored and distinguished guests in the ruler's house; to their amazement their ages were recognized, and Benjamin came in for special honor; the former roughness of the great ruler was exchanged for the greatest suavity and kindness, and they departed from Egypt with Simeon and Benjamin, feeling, no doubt, as though a great load were taken from them.

Eli Marvin, of Frankfort, Ind., who wrote in 1903: "I think a man could better afford to pay for a Peck-Williamson Underfeed than take any other make as a gift" —was recently asked by H. M. Plaisted, of St. Louis, for his experience in heating a ten-room residence with the Underfeed. Mr. Marvin replied:
"You ask me to state the bad points in this furnace. I can't do it, for the reason that I know of none. As to the cost of repairs that you inquired about, will say that this, I believe, is the fifth season my furnace has been used, and it has not been necessary to even renew the grate, which is usually the first part to give out in a furnace. The grate that was in my furnace when it was installed, is in it yet, and in apparently good condition. I can wish you no greater luxury than heating your home with the Peck-Williamson Underfeed. You could make no mistake in doing so, while it is very easy to install another make of furnace that would cause you constant regret."
All Smoke and Gases, wasted in other furnaces, are consumed and turned into heat in the UNDERFEED, for all the fire is on top. Lowest grade slack coal will give as much heat as highest grade anthracite. You save the difference in cost. "I'll Send and Pay the Freight on a Basket Washing Machine to any point East of the Mississippi for $3.50."
MAYOR TUNNINGTON.

I BELIEVE the "Basket Washing Machine" is the best and cheapest machine in the world today, and I am honest in that statement. The reason I believe it is because there is not another machine made that will do a washing and do it good in so short a time.
Yes, I'm Mayor of Fremont, Ohio.
Am Mayor now; and it is because I am Mayor that I have taken up this work.
There's no one in a position to feel the pulse of a community as well as that community's chief executive. He hears of the reverses in life, the hardships, the disappointments; he is supposed to be counselor, adviser, and able to suggest a remedy for all evils.
Well, I believe that by placing the "Basket Washing Machine" upon the market at $3.50—a machine that will wash as well as any machine made—I've lightened the burdens of more people than by any other method I might pursue. That was my idea in making the Basket Washer. This is an age of reform, square deal, glad hand, uplifting of humanity. We're here to help each other, give each other a fair chance. I am doing it. I know I am doing that every day, for I am daily sending washing machines to every part of the country and paying the freight myself.
You understand, don't you, why this appeals to me? You must see why I know the urgent, pressing need for a high grade machine at the lowest possible cost. I see it every day. I saw it until I made up my mind that such a machine should be offered to every one, and I shall do that to the limit of my ability.
I don't ask you to keep the Washer if you are not satisfied with it. Send it back at my expense. But I don't believe you will send it. There has never been one returned.
After you have discovered for yourself, by actual experience, that a tub of clothes can be washed in six minutes and less, and be washed clean by either you or your little girl, you are pretty certain to keep the Basket Washer. Then there is the price—$3.50—cheaper than any other good washer was ever before offered. And I'll go further: I'll guarantee it for five years, and it'll do a washing every day for that length of time.
WRITE TO ME TO-DAY ABOUT IT. OR, BETTER STILL, ORDER ONE. It is so simple that only a small circular is necessary to describe it fully.

A WILD RIDE UPON AN AVALANCHE

AN EXPERIENCE ON THE PERSIAN BORDER

By Rev. John Newton Wright

ONE of my fellow-missionaries is the Rev. E. W. McDowell of Van, Turkey. He is, like myself, a member of the West Persia Mission of the Presbyterian Church, the territory of which includes the Kurdistan Mountains on the Eastern border of Turkey, where the mountain Nestorians reside. While on a most laborious and self-denying tour among these mountain tribes lately, he met with a thrilling experience which he relates in a letter I have just received, and from which I quote for the benefit of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"I left Tkhuma, Kurdistan, Friday, January 4, with an escort of over thirty men. I dismissed as many as possible on the mountain side above Khani, a number, however, going on with me of their own accord, as they had business of their own in Julamerk.

"At two in the afternoon we reached the top of the mountain overlooking Tal, and in a few minutes began the descent. Nineteen of us had just started, six not yet having stepped off the top, when an avalanche occurred and all the nineteen of us were hurled to the bottom of the mountain. One man was lost. Three others were buried, but were dug out uninjured. One man had a shoulder dislocated. Aside from these casualties there were no serious injuries to any of the party. My own injuries, luckily, were confined to a bruised and sprained knee and a fracture of two ribs.

"It was a terrible experience and not easily described. With Kasha Yokhanan, Rabi Nisan and Sahda, I was following the men who had opened the road. At the top of the mountain it was so steep that I was unable to keep on my feet, and had fallen and was still on my back, when I had a flash-like glimpse of the whole side of the mountain in motion. Rabi Nisan cried out, 'Sahib, tliklan!' (we are lost!).

"There was a sensation as though falling through space, a gale of wind struck us in the face, and a cloud of snow shut out the world. Then came a succession of rapid wave-like motions and the snow began to break up. In spite of all my efforts to keep on the surface I was drawn under, and the snow, like a torrent of water, surged over and around me on all sides.

General View of the City of Tabreez, Persia

"I, as helpless as a pebble in a flood, was rolled and tumbled along inside the avalanche. I can recall several heavy jolts as though from falls. Once my body was bent forward on my legs until I thought that my back was about to break; but finally all other sensations were lost in a struggle for breath, as my mouth filled up with snow. At what seemed to me the point of suffocation, there was a sudden slowing up of the motion of the avalanche, and I found myself lying on the surface of the snow. Frantically, but with difficulty, I emptied my mouth of snow and recovered my breath. I think that I was on my feet before I did this, in instinctive desire to escape from peril. As I stood there I looked up the mountain along the track of the avalanche, and I can describe my feeling only as one of fear and amazement as I saw the men whom we, but a few moments before, had left standing on the top of the mountain, still standing there outlined against the clear sky, but scarcely discernible as men, so great was the distance, and I had come that distance in less than two minutes. Kasha Yokhanan, on a previous trip, had timed himself by watch, and he said that it was two hours' fast walking from the point where I landed to the top of the avalanche. It was the opinion of all, including those who had remained at the top, that the time occupied in our descent was not more than two minutes.

"I had come the farthest of the whole party. How it was that no more lives were lost, and especially that no bones were broken, was marvelous. The villagers regarded it simply as a miracle, as the proportion, according to all precedent, should have been the other way. And it is with humble gratitude that I acknowledge God's hand in our remarkable preservation.

"When I rose to my feet I was swathed in snow from head to foot; the snow had been forced into my pockets and inside all my clothing. I was hatless and my hair was matted with ice. The sun had set behind the mountain, and the icy wind raised by the avalanche was congealing me when God's care was again made manifest, for lying on the snow not ten feet away was my heavy overcoat. Sahda had been carrying it, and he came out away above, but the overcoat had been brought down to me. I threw it over my head and beat my blood into circulation and then looked around for the others.

A SERMON

By Rev. James B. Ely, D.D.*

TEXT: ACTS 3: 6

"In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk"

THE real secret of Pentecost is found after what is generally termed Pentecost is past. More of the principles of Pentecost are found in the third chapter of Acts than in the second. The strength of a great movement must be measured not during the stages of preparation, nor when it glitters with brilliancy of popular enthusiasm. The normal standard of a settled, continuous aggressiveness marks the real strength that has been gained. It is not the great isolated deed of one man on a special occasion that marks the man's value to God or humanity, but what his normal average life is. If there is not a high average, the special event arouses suspicion.

The greatness of Peter's reformation, his baptism of the Holy Spirit, and the reality of a new and fixed purpose is best revealed in the third chapter of Acts, in the performance of a simple deed which in its spiritual and practical application lies within the possibility of all Christian workers. Peter, in his relation to this one man lying helpless and lost at the gate of the temple, reveals three foundation principles for evangelism more clearly than can be found in any other portion of the Bible. One can scarcely think of a single relation either to God or man that is overlooked in this modest deed which has been so long overshadowed by Pentecost.

Three Basic Principles

The three foundation principles are therefore worthy of the closest study as applying to present movements. They have also an application to every life that calls itself Christian. We find here, first, the aim; second, the method; and third, the results of a truly God-inspired work.

The aim. I want to hold this poor, lonely, neglected, helpless beggar, lame from his birth, before Christendom as the supreme aim of every effort to extend God's kingdom. This man represents a class to be met and a condition to be overcome. He is also right at hand. There is nothing theoretical here.

There is possibly more confusion about the aim of evangelism than anything else. Every movement has some aim, and the aims are as abundant as the movements themselves. And then sometimes the expressed aim is discovered not to be the real aim. Among the many things aimed at I may mention the following: Some say the supreme need of the time is a baptism of the Holy Ghost. We must therefore stop our machinery and wait. Others say a revival of prayer is needed above all things. Still others, a willingness to do personal work. Some feel the great need is the quickening of their particular church, and not a few are found among the denominational leaders who, if closely questioned, will sometimes secretly admit that their supreme desire is to see their denomination throb once more with fervor and efficiency. There are not a few denominationalists who still hold the conviction expressed in my hearing by one in New York. He said: "We felt we were the especial custodians of God's revelations."

The Aim to Save Men

Of course, the aim of all such, if to reach the world, is to do it through their own channel. Such a statement always makes others suspicious that the agent is exalted beyond the aim. When I came to New York two years ago to take some part in a proposed non-sectarian movement to reach the people with the Gospel of Christ, at once the report was circulated, which I had to combat, that "this man is the agent of Presbyterianism and he seeks supremely the advancement of his denomination." This damaging report came very near blocking a movement of God which sought solely the interest of this "man at the gate," and which aimed to make every other aim, no matter how precious, secondary. But should we not seek the baptism of the Holy Ghost and give ourselves to prayer? You may put it either way: We need to be baptized with the Holy Spirit before we can really help the man; or, If we sincerely aim to reach this man, the power of God will be present. In either case the aim is not the agent, but the man.

What the uppermost aim was in the minds of the disciples when they waited ten days, out of which they came forth a united band of disciples for Pentecost, I do not know. Their aims and purposes may have been as mixed as ours often are, although perfectly sincere as are those of people to-day. Some sought comfort for their broken hearts, others assurance, forgiveness, the reorganization of the band of disciples, perpetuating the memory of their departed Lord, the promised Holy Ghost. They may have had everything before them that a body of Christians have to-day; but no matter what their varied and inconsistent aims were, God's aim for them was the redemption of the world as represented by this man, who from childhood had waited in ignorance. This man represented the object which was the aim Jesus had, for which he left the Father's bosom and came to earth, lived and died and rose again. For this same purpose he would give the Holy Spirit, hear united prayer, comfort broken hearts, quicken spiritual life, etc.

The Test of Methods

The emphasized aim will put every agent and agency in its proper place and will test the value of all. If this man is not being lifted into new life, then we must examine the sincerity of our aim. In our enthusiasm for the multitudes abroad or the crowds at home, we must remember the crowds are made up of individuals and are reached through individuals. Your big mass meeting fails, your summer school fails, your foreign mission fails, your prayer fails, Pentecost fails, the tent fails, if through it all and back of it all we have not stretched out our hand in Christ's precious name and lifted up this man at the gate and caused him to walk with newness of life.

What is true in America is true to some degree throughout Christendom. Four hundred thousand Italians are at the gate, 850,000 Jews are at the gate, multitudes of other foreign-speaking people are at the gate and can be reached. God placed them there as he did this man to give us the proper Christian aim and test our sincerity of aim. They seek silver and gold, and if the Christian Church has not something infinitely better to give or cannot give it, she has failed. The man at your side is represented here. Your neighbor, your unsaved child, the Sunday School scholar—every helpless, powerless, nominal Christian, is still at the gate, even though he may be in the church.

If you are not aiming to help the other man you are at the gate yourself and must be lifted into new life. If you have new life, standing on your own feet, baptized with the Spirit, then prove it by helping this man. Don't draw your skirts about you. If you don't do something for him, Jesus will say, "You did it not to me." Nothing can be substituted, no matter how good, but all can be helped. Bend every effort and every prayer to this end. Put out your hand now to the one next to you in the name of Christ. Blessing him you will be blessed, helping him you will be helped, saving him you will be saved. Look upon him—be moved with compassion for him. Don't resist, don't try to get rid of him—aim, aim at him. Don't lose sight of him in your hurry to preach. Don't pass him; he is not worthless. He's valuable, and you are responsible for making him walk.

How the Man was Healed

We come now to speak of the method. A special effort was made by the two disciples, but it was made as they were on the way to the regular service. One did not interfere with the other. Both were important, and one was useless without the other. It was a united effort. Peter and John. Peter was the preacher and John the layman. John may have said, "Peter, don't let your enthusiasm go wild over that poor beggar." He might have suggested a committee or a series of prayer meetings or a hospital for him, but Peter pushed his hand right down into that of the poor man and connected him with God. Every difficulty met with to-day in reaching a world that lies at the gate could have suggested itself to John. The church was so near by that some might have felt their responsibility was ended. If it was a matter of getting him to church, his friends could have carried him. But Peter and the Spirit of God in him knew it was best to save him at the g for if he got inside once as the supreme goal of t effort, he never would have walked. God's metho always to save men where they are, "at the gate," man is at the gate until he is saved. The Church is place for saved people and it is her responsibility t out to "the man at the gate."

The Saving Look

Peter and John looked on him. This was more t an ordinary hasty glance and pass by on the other s The same kind of a vision that Christ had when looked on the multitudes and was moved with com sion possessed their hearts. They had the same s that moved Christ. The direction of all their eff is indicated by this look. If the churches and Christ will once look unitedly, with the spirit of Christ, u this man at the gate, it won't be long before they be drawn to him as truly as to Christ himself. They invite him, as Peter did this lame man, to look on th The poor man is to get this first vision of God by lo ing on Peter and John. He may have read of G possibly may have heard the name of Jesus, but ne saw anything of the nature and character of God u he looked into the face of the Spirit-filled man. If lives do not invite inspection then we must empha the aim and look on the man at the gate and feel responsibility for him until we cry out for God's s and power and blessing until the man can see God in If the multitudes at our gate do not see God in us, wh are they ever going to see him?

The agency employed consisted of Peter's hand Christ's name. Here is the central secret of Pente and every advance movement for God: the hur and the divine co-operating over a lost soul. Th two halves of the one great eternal truth for the wor redemption must be kept in view and equally emp sized. Ever since Pentecost we have been swing from one side to the other, rather than holding the equally together. Some have been inclined to say the worker to-day as men in the time of William Ca said to him, when he wanted to be a missionary, God wants to convert the heathen, he can do it w out you." Nowadays, in our extreme desire to practical, we almost say we don't need God. We be honest, we will feed the hungry, relieve the pressed, educate the ignorant. We would lift the n ourselves without God's aid.

Combination of Divine and Human

But carefully observe the combination. Here Peter's hand, the human; Christ's name, the divi Was Peter's hand essential? The man would h remained lying at the gate were it not for Peter's ha Peter's hand would not have raised the man an i toward permanent cure, were it not for Christ's na The human hand and Christ's name must bend gether over the lost. The proof of the measure of faith in Christ's name is our readiness to stretch fo the hand. If I believe that Christ desires to save t man, then my poor but consecrated hand must co-op ate in that purpose. Thus the practical test with lies not only in preaching and planning, getting rea and having united co-operation, resulting chiefly simply extending our hands in the direction of the l but I must put my hand right down to the hand of t other man and expect him to rise. This is the cruc point in evangelism to-day.

Wherever this is being done in the name of Chr souls are rising into new life. Where we fail at t point we fail completely, and no amount of popu enthusiasm or strength of organization or attraction song can be successfully substituted. It is compa tively easy to preach, especially with Pentecos atmosphere; easy to organize and to suggest plans, a even to execute them. It is possible to go to the forei field or travel up and down our home land and inter crowds; to build large seminaries and have the appe ance of a great work, and possibly have a great wor but if the human consecrated hand is not actually the hand of others, helping helpless creatures at t gate in the name of Christ, we fall short of the ma and fail in results.

SECRETARY TAFT'S VISIT TO CUBA

He Reports Favorably on the General Outlook There and in Puerto Rico

TER inspecting work on the great canal at Panama, Secretary of War Taft, accompanied by Senator ge of South Dakota, Representa- arton of Ohio and Representative nond of Missouri, paid a visit to Cuba, for the e of ascertaining the actual conditions prevailing nd the prospects of a stable government being shed on the island. In conversation, after his Mr. Taft gave this interesting outline of his trip: e left Washington March 23, and reached Colon rch 30. "There are certain questions," aid, "that were submitted by rnor Magoon and discussed, h await decision by the dent or by the department. eral Barry and Governor oon both reported that the r in the island is excellent, gh there is still a good deal olitical feeling and excitement. Cuba this year will have the largest crops in her ory.

The party next went to Puerto Rico, where they nt four days considering questions of property be- en the government and the church, and also some military questions as to the abandonment of certain posts in the interior and the transfer to the civil government of some property in San Juan now used for military purposes. They attended the inauguration of Governor Post, and then brought back with them Governor and Mrs. Winthrop and Miss Ide, who were visiting there. On every side they found evidences of prosperity and also indications of the love and respect the people feel for Governor Winthrop. The two political questions that are uppermost there now are the question of citizenship and the question whether the Executive Council shall be elective.

Secretary Taft and Party at San Juan, Puerto Rico

In Puerto Rico Secretary Taft was shown about the fortifications and the beautiful suburbs of San Juan, while Mrs. Taft, Miss Ide, and Mrs. Winthrop were guests at a luncheon in the leading club. The palace was the scene of a reception in honor of the Secretary and Mrs. Taft. The entire party witnessed the inauguration of Regis H. Post as Governor of Puerto Rico, and enjoyed an automobile trip across the island before sailing for New York.

Apropos of Secretary Taft's visit to Cuba, Hon. Andrew D. White, ex-U. S. Ambassador to Germany, has made the following statement regarding the possibilities of Cuban annexation, which deserves consideration at the present time: "For years," writes Mr. White, "there have been those who wished to annex Cuba to our republic. There, I think, lies a great danger. I must confess to a great dread of seeing what would really be a great negro State, utterly incapable of self-government, made a part of our system, with at least two Senators and several Representatives at Washington, to take part in electing a President and in governing the American nation.

"Everything I saw in Cuba strengthens my conviction that Cuba as a State would be a curse to us; simply a vast rotten borough, with a small number of wealthy capitalists in the midst of an expansive negro population, utterly incompetent to govern themselves, to say nothing of aiding to govern the United States. I favor setting up the Cuban government, not only this time, but again and again, seventy times if necessary, sooner than making it a partner of our national system.

"Years ago, as commissioner to Santo Domingo, when General Grant and others thought of annexing the island, I learned the utter incompetency of the mixed races in the equatorial Spanish republics to govern themselves. Everything I saw then and have learned since regarding such republics has intensified my opposition to taking them into political partnership with ourselves."

A Beautiful Will

ONE of the most peculiar wills ever recorded is that of Charles Lownsbury, of Dunning, Ill., who died lately, leaving a document which was read at a meeting of lawyers in New York City. He was a man of no property, yet he bequeathed, from a heart overflowing with love and human kindness, that which was priceless. Here are some of his quaintly expressed bequests:

Item: I give to good fathers and mothers, in trust for their children, all good little words of praise and encouragement, and all quaint pet names and endearments.

Item: I leave to children inclusively, all and every, the flowers of the fields and the blossoms of the woods, with the right to play among them freely according to the customs of children, warning them at the same time against thistles and thorns. And I devise to children the banks of the brooks, and the golden sands beneath the waters thereof, and the odors of the willows that dip therein, and the white clouds that float high over the giant trees. And I leave the children the long, long days to be merry in, in a thousand ways, and the night and the moon and the train of the Milky Way to wonder at.

Item: I devise to boys jointly all the useful idle fields and commons where ball may be played; all pleasant waters where one may swim; all snowclad hills where one may coast, and all streams and ponds where one may fish, or where, when grim winter comes, one may skate; to have and to hold the same for the period of their boyhood; and all meadows with the clover blossoms and butterflies thereof, the woods and their appurtenances, the squirrels and birds, and echoes and strange noises, and all distant places which may be visited, together with the adventures there found. And I give to said boys each his own place at the fireside at night; with all pictures that may be seen in the burning wood, to enjoy without let or hindrance and without any incumbrance of care.

Now look at the result. What Peter and John by th realized, the lame beggar experienced and the rld observed, was that there is something better than er and gold. The man received what no power on th could give. He did not get new legs actually practically, for he got new power to walk. He eived what he never had before—he stood for the t time upon his own feet. He began to walk with ther power all his own. He leaped with joy in the ndance of life given. He praised God, the source every blessing, direct or indirect, and thus proved genuineness of the work. He was not afraid or amed to acknowledge God, nor to appreciate the rk of God's servant.

Second. He went into the temple on his own feet d legs and was not carried. He is where every con- t must be. He is not over-persuaded. No danger this man backsliding. He did not sign a card or ply lift his hand for prayer. The evidence he gave the Church and world was his new power, his per- al testimony, his complete change of position from outside as beggar to the inside as singer. Instead being a receiver, he is a giver.

Third. The Church is revived. An experience like this is poor opportunity for debate. The people see it is a real thing which has been done before their eyes. They flock around in wonder and amazement. Such a stir had not been in the temple since Jesus cleansed it, or stood and cried: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." There is nothing like an experience to stir people up. Revival is always created when a miracle is performed and never without it.

Fourth. Peter has an opportunity to preach another sermon equal to that of Pentecost. Both sermons are a defense of results which people did not understand. The occasion of the Pentecost sermon was a defense of results seen by the people with the disciples, but the occasion here is due to results seen with the poorest and most helpless object of divine grace. The result of the first sermon was 3,000 converts, but the result of this is to increase the number to 5,000. This led the disciples to prison, but there they only had a new congregation and opportunity to preach. It also proved that Peter and John were sufficiently interested in the man at the gate to risk their lives for him. The world has never suspected Peter and John of any other aim than to reach the man at the gate. The method had nothing in it but what any worker may use. The results were surely satisfactory to God, as they were a great advancement of God's kingdom.

Down in the human heart
Crushed by the tempter,
Feelings lie buried that grace can restore;
Touched by a loving heart,
Wakened by kindness,
Chords that were broken will vibrate once more.

Do you believe this? If you do believe, then you are beginning to see what God has already seen. You are on God's side. His name is ready to be called on. It is your privilege to put your hand into that of the next man in Christ's name, and raise him to new life and power. The summer season is just coming; multitudes in parks, fields and streets are ready for the Christians to step aside from the beaten track on their way to the temple and by tents, open-air meetings, wagons, automobiles, personal and united effort, reach the man. No season of the year is more inviting. Now is the time to test every faculty and power and blessing God has given, and by the doing of it every blessing will be multiplied.

The States Exhibits Palace — Jamestown Seal — The Palace of Transportation

JUST as the sun tipped the edge of the sea and crimsoned the eastern sky and the waters of Hampton Roads on the morning of April 26, the Norfolk Artillery Blues swung into position on the grounds of the Jamestown Exposition; the guns were unlimbered, and, a moment later, the crash of the first salute of three hundred guns sent the echoes booming for miles inland. It was the first act and opening ceremony of a day that will be a memorable one in the minds of all who were fortunate enough to attend the celebration of the inauguration of the Exposition.

Eight o'clock and the gates of the Exposition were thrown open. Long before that time, however, the people of the city of Norfolk, of Hampton and other cities and towns for miles about, together with the visitors from all the States of the Union, were up and preparing for the events of the day. By train and trolley they converged on one point of interest, while steamers from New York, Washington, Baltimore and other centres with water communication came to the docks, their decks swarming to the rails with tourists and pleasure-seekers.

The question of transportation had caused the management of the Exposition much worry, but by special arrangement, many of the trains that ordinarily stop at Norfolk were run straight to the Exposition grounds, thus avoiding transfers and needless confusion. The crowd that came, however, was large enough to tax the resources of a city ten times the size of Norfolk.

In order to have the official opening on the anniversary of the day on which the first party landed at a point near the present Exposition grounds, arrangements had to be hurried and many of the buildings were incomplete, as were some walks and roads. Visitors, however, were willing to overlook this in the general jubilee spirit of the day, and the sight of the naval display, and the grand review on Lee's Parade, as the great drill ground is called, was worth coming hundreds of miles to see, though one did not enter one of the exhibition buildings. C. Brooks Johnston, chairman of the Governing Board of the Exposition, said just before the official opening:

"While it is of course a source of some disappointment to the management that it is not possible to present on April 26 a completed Exposition, yet we shall view with a great degree of satisfaction the results which will then be in evidence.

"We wish to be fair with the public, as we shall hope it will be with us, and I desire, therefore, to authorize the unqualified statement that we expect that within two weeks of the opening, and certainly by the fifteenth of May, with favorable weather, the Exposition will be all that was expected or has been promised.

"We do not consider that we are unprepared, as expositions go, and we only ask protection against misrepresentation."

The crowds wandered about the various structures, and watched the gorgeous, gold laced uniforms of the distinguished officers and diplomats, while they waited for the arrival of President Roosevelt and his party, formally to open the Exposition.

All of the visitors who thronged the grounds were loud in their praise of the beautiful architectural effects of the exhibition. America has one style of building that she may truly call her own, and that is the colonial. The buildings constructed by the first settlers were for the first hundred years counterparts of those constructed in England in the days of "Good Queen Bess," with sharp roofs, and the upper stories overhanging the lower. From 1700 to 1830 there were constructed in America those homes with white walls and great pillared porches that we know as colonial. The colonial style has been followed in most of the larger buildings of the Exposition, the Palace of Commerce being one of the exceptions. The State buildings of the older States are replicas in brick, stone and wood of historical houses and halls of the colonial period.

The main auditorium, in which part of the opening exercises took place, and in which the President's reception was held, has one of the most beautiful pillared porches in America. The structure itself is of brick, with a magnificent dome. The pillars of the porch are Corinthian, and rise the full height of the building. In many of the others the great white pillars against of white or walls of red brick give a dazzling effe the scene whenever the sun shines and there ar clouds in the sky.

Virginia's State Building is a copy of the famous of Burgesses at old Williamsburg. The Pennsylv Building is a reproduction, both inside and out, of penter's Hall, Philadelphia, "Independence Hall, which the Declaration of Independence was signed, from whose belfry came the thrilling clang of the Lib Bell. The famous old bell itself has been brough the Exposition, and is being viewed by thousand patriotic Americans, who pass by it reverently and uncovered heads.

Hundreds of steamers, excursion boats and all craft added the shriek of their whistles the general din, as the Chief Executive ssed on to the landing place. Mr. Roosevelt went at once to the reviewing stand where the opening ceremonies were to occur.

Bishop Alfred Magill Randolph, bishop of the Episcopal diocese of Southern Virginia, made the opening prayer. Then Harry St. George Tucker, President of the Exposition, made the opening address. At its close he introduced President Roosevelt.

President Roosevelt's speech was devoted for the most part to tracing the development of the nation from the days of the Jamestown Colony until the present. He showed how each generation had had its own peculiar problems to face, and spoke of the lesson these former generations had for us as we are endeavoring to grapple with the problems of the present day. "At the outset," said the President, "I wish to say a word of special greeting to the representatives of the foreign governments here present. They have come to assist us in celebrating what was in very truth the birthday of this nation, for it was here that the colonists first settled whose incoming, whose growth from their own loins and by the addition of newcomers from abroad, was to make the people which one hundred and sixty-nine years later assumed the responsibilities and weighty duties of complete independence.

"In welcoming all of you I must say a special word, first, to the representative of the people of Great Britain. The fact that so many of our people have but a very small portion of English blood in no way alters the fact that this nation was founded by Englishmen, by the Cavalier and the Puritan. Their tongue, law, literature, the fund of their common thought, made an inheritance which all of us share, and marked deep the lines along which we have developed. It was the men of English stock who did most in casting the mould into which our national character was run.

"This landing at Jamestown possesses for us of the United States an altogether peculiar significance, and this without regard to our several origins. The men who landed at Jamestown, and those who, thirteen years later, landed at Plymouth, all of English stock, and their fellow settlers who, during the next few decades, streamed in after them, were those who took the lead in shaping the life history of this people in the colonial and revolutionary days. It was they who bent into definite shape our nation while it was still young enough most easily, most readily, to take on the characteristics which were to become part of its permanent life habit."

The President then traced the influence of the other races that came to this country on American character and institutions. From the task of the colonizer and the pioneer, and the men who fought the War of Independence, he came to the problems of the twentieth century. "We, too," he said, "in our turn, must prove our truth by our endeavor. We must show ourselves worthy sons of the men of the mighty days by the way in which we meet the problems of our own time. We carry our heads high because our father's did well in the years that tried men's souls, and we must in our turn so bear ourselves that the children who come after us may feel that we too have done our duty."

President Roosevelt pressed the gold button on the speakers' stand that was to set the machinery of the Exposition in motion, but as only part of this was in place, the signal only accomplished the ceremonial part of unfurling the thousand flags on the Exposition buildings.

The parade of all troops at the Exposition was led past the reviewing stand by Major-General Frederick Dent Grant. There were twenty thousand men in line, including soldiers of the regular army, the Marine Corps, sailors landed from the American and foreign fleets, regiments from the national guard of many States, and the military escorts of the governors of States who were present. Among the governors present in the line back of President Roosevelt were those of Maryland, Mississippi, Connecticut, West Virginia, Virginia, Rhode Island, Georgia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Delaware, New Hampshire, Florida, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Alabama, and Indiana.

The patriotic societies which had representatives on the platform were: Sons of the American Revolution, Daughters of the American Revolution, Society of the Cincinnati, Society of Colonial Wars, Colonial Dames, United Confederate Veterans and the Grand Army of the Republic.

The illumination of the buildings and grounds, just as the dusk of evening had begun to darken the outlines of the buildings, gave a most beautiful effect as viewed from the ships in the bay.

The electrical display had been arranged to surpass that of any exposition that has been held in this country. Even the incompleted buildings had been wired and vari-colored incandescent bulbs and arc lights put in position, so that on Friday evening there was nothing to spoil the beauty of the scene.

In addition to the displays on the buildings, which were arranged to show novel figures and set out the architectural lines of the buildings, the Boardwalk, the streets, the Lee Parade and all other parts of the Exposition reservation, were so lighted that it gave an outline of the entire Exposition in electric lights.

The ships in the harbor also hung out hundreds of lights, which were doubled by the reflections.

Bands of music were playing at the military camps, on the Exposition grounds, and on the warships, and crowds of people streamed up and down the water front, unwilling to leave the fascinating scene until late at night.

The Cradle of the Republic

WHEN President Roosevelt, with a single wave of his hand, set all the flags flying at Jamestown, and pronounced the words which opened the Exposition, he challenged the attention of the whole world to a spectacle without a parallel in modern history. The vast crowds there assembled, representing almost all nationalities and every social and official grade, from titled and decorated noble to simple citizen, could look backward for a moment beyond the splendid array of palaces and the brilliant land-and-water pageant, to that day in April, 1607, when, on the very site where the Exposition now stands, the little band of pioneers made a landing, and near which they soon afterward planted the first English settlement that succeeded in the New World. This is why Jamestown has a special significance for the Anglo-Saxon race. In the most complete sense, it was the Republic's cradle. There the first legislative assembly ever held on this Continent met in 1619, and the first laws were enacted for the government of the new colony.

It seemed as though all the fighting nations of the globe were represented in the great fleet of warships in Hampton Roads on opening day, April 26. Never before has such an armada of peace assembled in these waters. They had come from many ports overseas, and some no doubt almost by the ocean pathway that was taken by Raleigh's three gallant captains who, with John Smith as leader of the expedition, steered their stanch frigates, straining under clouds of canvas, up the Roads and to safe anchorage over practically the same course taken by the trim little gunboat Mayflower, when she bore the President and his party of distinguished guests to the Exposition dock.

May all success attend the Jamestown Tercentenary! May the multitudes who visit it find in its magnificent scenes, afloat and ashore, a new inspiration of patriotism and a feeling of sincere gratitude to Divine Providence for the many blessings that have come to us in the passing centuries. We are at peace with the whole world and on terms of friendship with all nations. Long may these conditions continue.

It is to be hoped that the Exposition managers and the good people of Hampton and Norfolk may learn a lesson from the experience of past expositions and try to make this latest one attractive to people of moderate means, as well as to the rich. It is essentially a patriotic affair, for all the people, and the adoption of any policy savoring of extortion would work incalculable injury to the whole enterprise. On the other hand, a liberal policy would attract countless thousands of visitors and assure financial success.

The Secret of Power

"THAT mystic line that Emerson bids us draw, "severing rightly His from thine, which is human, which divine," becomes increasingly difficult of definition the more one thinks of it. How much of any achievement is due to the worker, and how much to God who inspired the work, who can tell? As the preacher stands up in the pulpit and utters his message, can he say how much of it is his own production and how much is given to him? There are some moments in the crises of life when thoughts come like intuitions, and the difficulty vanishes. Where was the vulnerable point? Did we see it and strike the exact spot, or was it an inspiration from without? We say we need a revival, and we meet and plan and secure an eloquent preacher, and we pray for a blessing, but the result is sparse and poor. As we dwell on these facts we ask ourselves, is man of no account, are we powerless and all our efforts futile?

Thinking over these questions and idly turning the leaves of the Gospels, a significant question that our Lord addressed to his disciples strikes the eye. An immense crowd surrounded him, and he pitied them, knowing they must be hungry. He determined to feed them, but before doing so, he asked his disciples, "How many loaves have ye?" The question seemed irrelevant, but our Lord said nothing irrelevant. A miracle had to be worked, as he very well knew, before that throng could be fed. But he would not create the bread to feed them. He would use such provision as they had and bless that. There must be the combination, human and divine. "What are these among so many?" the disciples naturally asked, displaying the five loaves. So the preacher, the worker, the individual Christian in trouble asks now: "What am I, what are my resources in comparison with this great task? Do thou the work by thine almighty power." "Not so," Jesus replies, "what things have you toward the task?" The Christian is ashamed to produce them, they are so poor. But the Lord says, "Do not shrink; bring them hither to me." That is the divine principle of increase and multiplication. Bring your resources, your faith, your feeble effort, and see what Christ can do with them. "I never thought it could have been done," you say. "I did not think I could have succeeded." No, nor could you unaided; nor would Christ have done it for you at your empty desire. You need to put your own powers into Christ's hands for him to use. There is the mystic line that Emerson seeks. There is the secret of every victory that has been won in the great conflict.

Conditional Gifts

IN nothing is the extraordinary wisdom and discretion of Mrs. Russell Sage more conspicuous than in the fact that she has chosen to make unconditional gifts to the institutions which have enlisted her good will. A majority of the large givers in this country have weighted their munificence with a burden so great that what was honestly intended to be a boon has in numerous instances turned out to be a calamity. In every corner of this land there are small colleges doing wonderfully good work in the teeth of want and penury, struggling up stream against every sort of disadvantage, and yet deserving well of those whose means enable them to lend a helping hand in every good cause.

The heroism of faculty and students alike in some of the smaller educational institutions in the West and South cannot be stated in print, nor measured by any estimate lower than that of the recording angel. Professors and their wives and children subsist on stipends so meagre and students support themselves on means so narrow that people living in large towns or in the neighborhood of splendidly endowed universities could not believe the tale were it told them, and would hardly credit the evidence of their own eyes. When to such a college the gift of a library or a dormitory or a gymnasium is provisionally made, materializing only when its equivalent has been raised, the president sets forth on a weary tour of beggary, himself having pledged very likely a portion of his own insufficient salary as an earnest of his strong desire to raise the sum needed. Every professor and every professor's wife, every tutor and every student, with the families and friends of those who love the college, poor enough already, give someth from their limited incomes that the amount require make the conditional gift available may be raised.

The conditional gift presses heavily on institutions have attained a degree of prosperity, although t usually succeed in collecting the other half of the g The attempt to do this disheartens and almost wre institutions of equal merit encumbered by advers Many a poor college is better off before the provisi gift is offered than afterward, and many a town wo better do without a library than obtain it by the atte to double the munificence of some kind-hearted milli aire who sees only his side of the shield.

Secretary Taft's Appreciation

Of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Great Life-Saving Work in China

The American National Red Cross, Room 341, War Department, Washington, D.C.

April 23, 1907.

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:

In the name of the American National Red Cross, may I express to you and through you to the contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Chinese Famine Fund, the thanks and deep appreciation of the Society for the great work their most generous contributions made to that fund have accomplished in the relief of the starving multitudes in China. Without the great sum raised by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the bountiful cargo of the "Buford" provided by it, thousands of these poor people would have perished; but, saved by these merciful gifts, they can now live until their own fields provide the needed harvest.

Yours most sincerely,

(Signed) WM. H. TAFT,
President The American National Red Cross.

The White Man's Vices

DR. W. T. GRENFELL, the well-known medi missionary and founder of the Labrador Missi has stirred up the friends of Arctic exploration by statement that wherever the white man has penetra in the remote habitable north, the natives have s fered moral and physical deterioration. He even g further and declares that before the explorers a traders came to Greenland, the people were peacea and their lives were simple and healthful; but with white man came the white man's vices, and these, many localities, have so depraved the natives that Eskimos are now disappearing more rapidly even th the North American Indian. Missionaries have do and are doing excellent work among them; but drun enness, immorality and disease increase at a rate th threatens their early extinction.

This is a new and certainly a startling picture, and o which may well give the enthusiastic advocates of Arc expeditions food for reflection. There is a suggestion the good doctor's observations that the great Po quest is a ghastly illusion, as far as any substantial ga to science or advantage to commerce are concerned. A he very pertinently asks what benefit may be expect from traveling across a wilderness which at some seaso is partially open and at others a dreary, level desert ice, in search of an imaginary geographical point, whi one might easily pass without being aware of it.

But the doctor's blunt arraignment probably will pr duce nothing beyond a momentary flutter among th scientists. Like aeronautics and deep-sea dredging, pol exploration, though it may never have any commerci advantage, is valuable as adding to the sum of huma knowledge concerning the world we live in. Hopele it may be, but the lure of the frozen North will continue attract adventurous souls probably until the end of tim

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Conference of Premiers

ONE of the most remarkable gatherings of statesmen ever held was that recently assembled in the British capital. It was composed of the Premiers of Great Britain's self-governing colonies. The colonies represented were Canada, Newfoundland, Australia, New Zealand, Natal, Cape Colony, and the Transvaal. The aggregate area of the countries represented was over seven million square miles, with a population of over fourteen million persons. The statesmen had an abundance of topics to discuss. These included mutual trade relations, colonial defense, naturalization, postal facilities, a uniform currency, an Imperial Court of Appeal, and other subjects of mutual concern.

London gave a hearty welcome to the visiting statesmen, and to none more cordially than to Gen. Botha, a formidable leader in the recent war in the Transvaal, who has been elected Premier of the colony. Eight short years ago Gen. Botha was in the field, intent on killing as many Englishmen as possible, an inveterate enemy of England and everything English. Now, under the self-governing system conceded to the colony by Great Britain, the Boers have secured a majority of the members elected. Gen. Botha is the natural head of the colonial government. The fact is creditable to both sides of the quarrel and deserves to rank in history with our own reunion of North and South after the Civil War. There was no grudging in the reception of Gen. Botha, and none welcomed him more cordially than Gen. Roberts, who was the conqueror in the great struggle. Gen. Botha on his side was emphatic in his protestations of loyalty, and in the assurances he gave, that the members of the Transvaal Parliament would work heartily with the English members for the common welfare of the colony. There are not lacking pessimists who contend that it was too early to trust the colonists with self-government, and all kinds of evil are predicted; but Great Britain has made the experiment in firm confidence for good or ill. She expects that her magnanimity will be appreciated by her former foes. The spectacle of these statesmen from distant lands uniting under one supreme head in devising plans for the benefit of their respective nations is a type of that world-wide union which is yet to come under the rule of Christ in the millennium.

Premier General Botha—The Transvaal Parliament in Session

And the Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord and his name one (Zech. 14: 9).

Centenarian Romance

A St. Louis, Mo., journal describes a remarkable romance which is to culminate in a marriage in August next. A citizen of Missouri, who has spent most of his life in California, where he has amassed a fortune, succeeded recently in purchasing the estate near Tatesville, Conn., on which he was born and reared. He has attained the age of one hundred and one years, but is still hale and active. He arranged, on coming into possession of the estate, to hold a reunion of all his surviving friends. Among them was the sweetheart of his boyhood, whose parents had refused their permission for her to marry him. He traced her to England and sent her an invitation to join in the reunion. She replied that she would gladly accept, but as she is nearly a hundred years old, she could not take the voyage unaccompanied. Further correspondence ensued, and it was found that she, like her lover, had never married. The offer of marriage was renewed and accepted, and the aged visitor is preparing to cross the ocean to bring home his bride, and the projected reunion will become a marriage celebration. We may imagine that the two old people will rejoice that the hopes of their youth are to be fulfilled at last. It will be infinitely greater joy that will fill the hearts of Christ's people in that last great reunion which also has the figure of a marriage.

Let us be glad and rejoice: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready (Rev. 19: 7).

An Ominous Loaf

Among the peasantry in European lands, the shape assumed by the loaves put as dough in the ovens is generally regarded as indicative of approaching good or ill fortune. There are few housewives who are not distressed when a loaf with a deep crease on its surface is drawn from the oven. That is supposed to indicate that some member of the family will die within a short period. A long list might be made of the auguries and omens read from the marks on the loaves by superstitious persons. These require some skill to understand, but none was needed to explain a mark which a housewife residing near Waterbury, Conn., recently found on a loaf she had baked soon after taking possession of a new home. On turning over the loaf she read in plain letters, "Died on May 1." Feeling sure she had but a few weeks to live, she became hysterical. She was not fully reassured even when her husband examined the oven in which the loaf had been baked and showed her that the ominous marks on the loaf came from an inscription on an old tombstone, which the builder had used for the floor of the oven. After all, the warning may well be heeded. It did but set a date for an event which is inevitable, though uncertain. The uncertainty ought to operate in the opposite way, producing immediate preparation, but it does not. An event that may occur to-day, or to-morrow, or in the far future, is precisely the event for which provision is postponed. People say now as they did in old times:

The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are far off (Ezek. 12: 27).

A Cosmopolitan Service

The cosmopolitan character of New York's population was conspicuously shown at a recent service in the Mariner's Temple, of which Rev. George H. Dowkontt is pastor. The church is doing a work among many nationalities, and on Sunday, April 28, there was a general reunion. In the congregation which filled the famous old church there were Russians, Norwegians, Letts, Italians and English. A Christian worker of each nationality delivered an address in his own tongue and all joined in the singing of hymns translated into their respective languages. The fact that each had found in Christ the satisfaction of the individual need showed how universal is the antidote he provides for the sins and sorrows of all nations.

Lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb (Rev. 7: 9).

An Evil-Doer Exiled

A young man was at the bar of a court in Paterson, N. J., who, though a mere youth, has a criminal record. Though belonging to a respectable family he has been an associate of burglars and other criminals and has several times narrowly escaped arrest. The respectability of his family saved him, though the police were convinced that he was concerned in the crimes. There was no direct evidence against him, so he was warned and allowed to go free. He promised to reform, but continued his acquaintance with bad characters. At last he was caught and two weeks ago was arraigned for stealing a bicycle. He was convicted and a day was set for sentence to be passed upon him. When his name was called, his sister appeared and pleaded in his behalf. She undertook that if his sentence was suspended, she would take him to Scotland and place him in the charge of his elder brother, who is a farmer in that country. The judge granted the request, and giving the young prisoner a lecture and warning him against returning to the United States, he released him. If Scotland knew his character it would not welcome him. A man who is set on evil is a nuisance and a curse wherever he goes. It is a serious social problem to know how to deal with such men. Society has no remedy that has ever proved effectual. Not until the power of Christ is exerted is there any hope. The fact that it does succeed in changing character is the strongest proof of its divine nature.

Such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified in the name of the Lord Jesus (I. Cor. 6: 11).

A Dangerous Agent

A cable dispatch from Berlin warns medical colleges and societies in this country of dangers attending the use of the Roentgen rays by inexperienced persons. Eminent German professors say that "the undoubted merit and efficiency of the Roentgen rays in diagnosing and treating certain diseases have led to the use of the rays by physicians who have gained their knowledge of them from books alone. The result has been that one of the most valuable agents mankind has ever acquired has become, in unqualified hands, more like dynamite than any other thing in the world." Patients who subject themselves to treatment under physicians or others who have inadequate knowledge or skill run the risk of losing their health, or even their lives. That such a condition prevails was credited not only to the lack of examination of those who use the rays, but also to the failure of many medical colleges to provide instruction that would enable students to gain proficiency in the use of this wonderful and powerful agent. It would be a pity if so precious a boon as the Roentgen rays became discredited through the ignorance of the doctors who use them. It is possible unless the remedy suggested by the German professors is adopted of having regular instruction given. The same danger as to religion exists and has existed from apostolic times. Peter was aware of it.

Things hard to be understood which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction (II. Peter 3: 16).

INTO STILL WATERS

A NEW SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

OVER in the next row of seats a young girl's eyes gleamed with sudden interest. She had been watching for some time the heavily veiled woman and the earnest-faced, good-looking young man talking together, and now as the man turned away, she saw that the woman had risen and impulsively hurried after him. The girl saw the black-gloved hand laid for a moment on the man's coat-sleeve, and she saw the glad light leap to the man's eyes; but she did not hear the low-spoken words that came to the man's ears.

"Forgive me, Dr. Spencer; I was unkind and unjust to speak as I did. I do appreciate your kindness, and I do thank you for your sympathy."

"And you'll come—home?" suggested the man, eagerly.

She flushed and drew back.

"Not that—not to-day! Don't ask me to do that," she begged. "But I'll come soon—I'll promise to come soon."

Back in the seat across the way the young girl felt vaguely disappointed: the black-gowned woman had come back and sat down, while the good-looking man had gone away alone. The girl would have willed it otherwise.

It must have been a week later that the doctor's mare stopped once again before the great stone lions of Five Oaks.

"May I see your mistress a moment?" asked the doctor of the old woman who answered his ring. The man tried to speak as if it were an everyday occurrence this morning call; but the woman made no secret of her surprise as she answered:

"But, doctor, you know her orders—she sees no one!"

"Yes, I know," frowned the man. "But I'll take the risk this time. Just tell her, please, that I asked you to give her my name. Thank you," he added, as the woman turned hesitatingly away.

Three minutes later she returned with amazement still written on her face.

"Mrs. Kendall will be down directly," she murmured; and almost immediately the doctor heard a light step on the stairs.

"I don't know why I consent to this, Dr. Spencer," said Mrs. Kendall with a faint smile as she entered the reception-room, "unless it is that I'm still repentant for my rude words of a week ago."

The doctor raised a deprecatory hand.

"It was I who was rude, I fear," he returned; "and now I am about to trespass still further on your kindness. I have come to ask a favor."

"A favor!"

The doctor saw and understood the quick stiffening of the slight figure before him.

"Yes," he said hurriedly. "Mrs. Merton up on the hill yonder is in great trouble. She has asked to see you. Will you—"

The tense muscles relaxed and Mrs. Kendall sank weakly into a chair.

"Doctor, how can you ask me?" she cried, with more than a touch of irritation in her voice. "You know I cannot go."

The doctor was silent.

"I never make calls, or—or receive them," she finished a bit sharply.

"I understand," murmured the doctor in a low voice, "and I fully realize my transgression. The nature of my errand must be my excuse."

"But I never even heard of this Mrs. Merton," objected Mrs. Kendall, restlessly. "Doctor, can't you see? It is quite out of the question! What is she to me or I to her? Why can I not be left in peace? Why need I drag my sorrow before the world?"

For a moment there was no reply, then the doctor said gently:

"Mrs. Kendall, a week ago I said to you that no one lives quite to himself. May I tell you a story?"

Mrs. Kendall frowned and looked sharply into the doctor's face.

"If, but," she said after a minute, not [illegible] to be [illegible]sly.

"I could [illegible] you," bowed the man gravely; then he turned his eyes toward a swaying [illegible]re tree-branch outside the window, and began in a low voice: "Some years ago there was in this town a woman with an only daughter." Mrs. Kendall stirred, and half rose from her chair; but the man did not seem to notice, and at his next words she fell back to her old position. "This girl grew to young womanhood, sweet, pretty and loving. To her mother she was the one bright spot in a rather dull world—the one object about which centred all her hopes and ambitions. At eighteen the girl ran away from home with a man named McGinnis, who had worked on the farm. That was the last ever heard from her. The mother lived, and to-day lies crippled on a bed of great pain. A week ago her husband died, leaving her quite alone in the world. That mother is the woman who has sent for you to-day. She says there is just one woman in the world whose face she wants to see—whose sympathy she craves—who will quite understand."

"The eager eyes swept the sheet of paper from top to bottom"

The doctor's voice trailed into silence. His eyes were still fixed on the bare tree-branch outside the window. There was a long pause, then Mrs. Kendall rose to her feet.

"I will be ready in five minutes, doctor," she said in a low voice, as she left the room.

"Thank God!" breathed the do[illegible] softly, as he watched the slender f[illegible] disappear down the long hall. "It [illegible] be a beginning, at least!"

CHAPTER IX

IT was, indeed, a beginning. For[illegible] first time in three years Mrs. Ke[illegible] allowed her thoughts to rest on some[illegible] other than her own; and for the first [illegible] in her life she came into contact [illegible] misery and want. The shock was g[illegible] and it awoke her to sudden action.

The peculiar circumstances of the [illegible] made it particularly appealing. The [illegible] lonely years spent by that other m[illegible] waiting, waiting, always waiting—[illegible] well she knew them! The vast, soun[illegible] space into which that other daughter [illegible] stepped—how well she knew that, too[illegible]

No longer did Mrs. Kendall spen[illegible] her days in darkened chambers, or in [illegible] ing over a woolly dog in the sunlight; [illegible] gave some of them now to a lonely [illegible] woman in the little red farmhouse. [illegible] with these visits of Mrs. Kendall's [illegible] comforts such as the farmhouse had n[illegible] known: books, flowers, fruit, and a [illegible] nurse whose touch was wonderfully so[illegible] ing to the poor old bones so long use[illegible] unskilful handling. But even better [illegible] all this were the long talks in the twi[illegible] when mother spoke to mother, and v[illegible] two burdened hearts met on comm[illegible] ground.

Nor was this all. From the very [illegible] Mrs. Kendall had exerted herself to [illegible] trace of the young girl who long ago [illegible] run away with the man named [illegible] Ginnis. It is true she met with l[illegible] success, for the young people had cov[illegible] their tracks well, and even the direc[illegible] they had taken was not known. [illegible] doctor, too, joined in the search, and [illegible] also was unrewarded—unless he chos[illegible] consider the new light in Mrs. Kend[illegible] eye and the new flush on Mrs. Kend[illegible] cheek as such. The doctor was certa[illegible] feeling very thankful these days—[illegible] something.

It had been two months since [illegible] Kendall's first visit to the farmhouse w[illegible] a letter bearing the New York postm[illegible] came to Mrs. Merton.

"Read it, Mis' Kendall, please, ma'a[illegible]" begged the sick woman. "I wa'n't ne[illegible] much hand ter read writin', an' I c[illegible] think who'd be a-writin' ter me."

Mrs. Kendall tore open the letter [illegible] glanced at the signature; then all [illegible] color fled from her face, only to co[illegible] back the next instant in a rosy flood.

"Mrs. Merton, it's signed 'Sadie,'" she faltered. " 'Sadie.' "

"Sadie? Sadie? My own Sadie? R[illegible] it—read it—oh, read it quick, Mis' K[illegible] dall! Why, it's Sadie, my little gir[illegible] cried Mrs. Merton, sobbing for joy.

" 'Dear Mother,' " began Mrs. Kend[illegible] in a tremulous voice; " 'I don't know I ought to call you that now, for ma[illegible] you don't want me no more as a dau[illegible] ter. But I want you, and I hain't ne[illegible] stopped wanting you. Even at the fir[illegible]

LANNING A GREAT TENT CAMPAIGN

"The advance of last year," said the ... Dr. C. L. Goodell, chairman of ...Committee of One Hundred, "was ...only in the increased number in ...dance, but especially in the direc... of effectiveness of the service ...ered and in the systematic plan for ...wing up the summer campaign by ...nal attention to those who were ...lessed. Hundreds have been visited by our helpers, ...many have been brought into connection and ...bership with our churches.

The effect on the communities where meetings have ... held has been most marked and beneficial. Hundreds of homes have been made better and pleasanter. Discouraged mothers have been visited by our workers, and new hope has shown itself in new interest to have the home bright, cleanly and cheerful.

An Open Air Gospel Tent in New York

"We find prejudice against the church disappearing where this work goes. We are persuaded that nothing will cut the nerve of anarchy and save us from the schemes of wicked men like the earnest presentation of the Gospel by consecrated and unselfish men and women. Many who once opposed us now welcome us, and there are almost innumerable openings, if we had the means to enter them."

The influence of the evangelistic work is not confined to New York, as many other cities throughout the land have been stimulated to institute similar work in their own communities. The churches and young people's societies gave their hearty support to the work last summer, realizing in consequence a new sense of the possibilities of Christian service, and a better understanding of the class of people who do not attend church, but who are ready to listen to a manly presentation of Christian truth, and who appreciate the efforts of those who they have thought were out of sympathy with them.

The tent evangelistic movement has passed its experimental stage, and has demonstrated beyond all question that such efforts can be made grandly successful. The committee will adhere to its policy of taking no collections at the meetings, relying on general contributions by those who desire the extension of Christ's kingdom.

All who are interested in the work of the Evangelistic Committee can send their subscriptions to Mr. John S. Huyler, treasurer, 64 Irving Place, New York, or Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D.D., 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York.

Near the southern end of Lake Urumia, in the prov...e of Azerbijan, Persia, is a large town called Sowook ...lak (Cold Spring). The inhabitants are mostly ...slems of a rough, rude sort. One of the photo...aphs I enclose shows a Kurdish woman of that region. ...e has been to the cold spring or the river to get a ... of water, and is carrying it on her back to ... home. Her foot-gear consists of slippers ...ich only cover her toes. They will be easily dropped ... at the entrance to her dwelling. Her features are ...licative of the dark mind and hard life. Another photograph shows a man and a couple of boys from the same region. They, also, are Kurds. The boy at the left has a pair of Persian socks thrown over his arm. Most of these Kurds live more like ravening wolves than like men. They greatly need the Gospel. Some two millions of these degraded but naturally capable Kurds reside in the bounds of our West Persia Mission field. We have not had the men or the means as yet to open up Gospel work among them. So we were glad when, some three years ago, a

Youthful Kurdish Mountaineers

German society sent Pastor Von Oertzen and his accomplished wife to Cold Spring, with the special view of evangelizing these wild tribes.

Last fall, Mr. Dammon, a polished young German gentleman—an Oriental philologist and fine musician—came to spend a year or so with the pastor, in order to make a special study of the Kurdish dialects. All went well till about a month ago, when one night three masked men in Kurdish costume dug through the earthen wall about the mission premises. They then entered the room downstairs where Mr. Dammon was sleeping. A little later he was found seated in a corner of the room dead, with twenty deadly sabre wounds in his body.

The murderers then went upstairs. The Von Oertzens awoke to find three masked men, armed with daggers and pistols at their side. The wife besought them not to kill her husband, and tried at the same time to appease them by handing them her rings, watch, money and other valuables. They were somewhat placated, but before leaving struck the pastor on the head with a dagger, inflicting an ugly but not fatal scalp wound.

The local Persian governor has, I hear, tried hard to arrest the murderers, but with no certain results as yet. The people of Cold Spring have shown much sympathy with the pastor and his wife.

We hope and pray that the mission work begun for the Kurds may not be broken up by this fiendish deed. May God, whose prerogative it is to bring good out of evil, so overrule this great wrong as to bring salvation to these wild Kurdish tribes.

Among the Workers

—Evangelist Bennurel, assisted by Mr. Allen as musical leader, held a series of successful meetings at Gowanda, N. Y., lately.

—Evangelist E. R. Hermiston, Hillsboro, Ore., lately closed a very successful meeting at McMinnville, where many college students accepted Christ.

—A revival of thirteen days' duration closed Sunday, April 14, at Clarence, Mo. It was conducted by Evangelist F. A. Geisenheiner, of Decatur, Ill.

—President C. H. Madison of the Federation of Gospel Missions reports: "The work of the National Federation is proving its usefulness and going steadily forward, slowly but surely uniting the missions of this country into a solid army for Christian work."

—Mr. W. H. Forsythe, Milledgeville, Ga., writes that since the great victory for temperance at Knoxville, Tenn., where the temperance forces won by a majority of 2,000, the saloon-keepers are going into honorable business. One has established a shirt factory.

—The eighth series of Sunday afternoon theatre services conducted by Pastor S. Edward Young, of the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., closed recently. The attendance was larger than ever before, on several occasions hundreds being turned away.

—Dr. Alice B. Condict writes from Ludhiana, India: "The elegant static electric machine which The Christian Herald readers sent me is doing good work. My wards are daily crowded to their utmost capacity, and I am doing pioneer work in this line. Praise God for The Christian Herald's help!"

—The Rev. Thomas Law, Secretary of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England and Wales, is visiting this country. He is the guest of the National Federation of Churches. His itinerary will give him an opportunity to meet the ministers and laity of New York, Providence, Boston, Chicago, Pittsburg, Washington, Philadelphia, and other cities.

—During a recent revival service at Aberdeen, S. D., fire broke out under the platform on which some 300 persons were sitting. There were about 2,000 in the audience. Evangelist R. E. Johnson, who has a powerful voice, averted a panic by instantly starting a Gospel song, in which the choir quickly joined. All got out safely, although the rear of the platform was in flames before the evangelist and choir left it.

THE FOLLY OF FIGHTING GOD

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAF

JACOB and his sons, the father and the brothers of Joseph, numbered seventy persons besides their servants, when they came as famine refugees to reside in Egypt (verses 1-5). At the time of their leaving Egypt their number had swelled to over two million. The intervening period was 215 or 430 years. Let us waste no time on that immaterial controversy. The "chosen family," which had begun with two, Abraham and Sarah, had become two million in fulfilment of God's promise to Abraham that his seed should be as the stars in number, and as the sand upon the seashore.

Mummy of Rameses II.

Joseph had placed his father and brothers, on their arrival, in the best of the land, then called Goshen, now the Delta. Thus favored of man and chosen of God, what wonder that they became so prosperous a people that their presence was a matter of anxiety to the Egyptians? Their natural alertness and vigor made the Egyptians think of them as a foe to be dreaded, if foe they should become.

Joseph's services to Egypt were forgotten. The emperor of Egypt was still called Pharaoh, as the emperors of Russia are called Czars, but he belonged to a different family if not a different race from the Pharaoh of Joseph's time. This new Pharaoh was named Seti. His mummified body has recently been found and placed in a museum, as is that of his greater son, Rameses II. A picture of Seti's body appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on April 10 of this year, page 327.

Israel Oppressed

Seti, the new ruler, sent forth an edict that a check should be put upon the

Gigantic Statues of Rameses II. and his Wife

Hebrews, as the descendants of Jacob had come to be called. The edict from the throne doomed the Hebrews to hard labor. It was probably after the throne passed from Seti to Rameses II. that this labor was devoted to building two store cities in which to place the king's army stores, Pithom and Raamses, the first of which has been uncovered in its ruins near the Suez Canal. Each man was required to make a certain number of bricks a day, a large number, almost beyond the possibility of human labor to accomplish. Taskmasters were set over them, Egyptians of course, and they were charged to make the Hebrews "serve with rigor." The latter could not stop for a moment's rest but the lash of the taskmaster was upon their shoulders. Hard work, however, did not kill the Hebrews, because God was with them. "The more they were afflicted the more they multiplied and grew." Their growth became daily more of a problem to the king of Egypt. He increased their tasks. Bricks have been found in Egyptian ruins of this period made of baked clay and chopped straw, and there are also in the pictorial histories representations of slaves of Hebrew physiognomy, making bricks under Egyptian taskmasters.

Still the Hebrews were not depleted in numbers, and another vain edict went out from the throne that all boys of the Hebrews should be killed as soon as born.

Illustration and Application

Genesis, the Bible's introduction, has told us about the formation of the world, and now Exodus will describe the creation of the chosen nation, through whom religion was to be given to the world. We shall see Israel at school; first, in the preparatory school of Egyptian slavery, then in their "bush college" of the wilderness. In individual lives the coming out of bondage and through the wilderness into the Land of Promise is a history that often repeats itself.

Small Beginnings Recalled

"These are the names of the sons of Israel, which came into Egypt; . . . seventy souls: . . . The children of Israel . . . increased abundantly" (verses 1-7). When Israel had come to be numbered by millions they gratefully recalled the three score and ten of the seed-basket that God brought from Canaan to Egypt, which was to go back multiplied many thousandfold. In like gratitude, the people of the United States recall how "God sifted all nations" to prepare seed great in quality though small in quantity, with which to build a nation whose mission should be to give an example of self-government to the world, as surely as Israel's mission was to give religion to the world. So in our individual lives we should gratefully recall from what humble beginnings God has led us to wealth, or knowledge, or other large opportunities of service. In all our growth, while man plants and waters, God gives the increase by furnishing seed, and soil, and sun. There is never any ground for pride, but only for thanksgiving.

"There arose a new king over Egypt, who knew not Joseph." As Joseph in the last lesson acted as a providence to his brothers, and subjected them to a series of trials to test and develop their characters, so God, in the lessons now to be studied, puts their descendants through the theological school of affliction and deliverance, to prepare them to be the chosen nation through whom he would give the true religion to other nations. Apepi II., a foreign Pharaoh, one of the "shepherd kings," who therefore had no hesitancy in promoting Joseph, another foreigner, and in welcoming his father and brothers to the best of the land, had been displaced by the native dynasty of the Ramessids, who "knew not Joseph," and feared that the Israelites living on their Eastern border might aid the enemy whenever there should be another incursion of Hittites or some other "shepherds," as they called the vigorous rural tribes. They would not have feared the Israelites unless they had been oppressed. The preventive which Seti and Rameses II. proposed was not more justice, but more oppression.

A Losing Fight Against God

"Come, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply" (verse 10). It was the exaggeration of a guilty conscience of a politician seeking excuse for oppression when Rameses II. said, "The Israelites are more and mightier than we," for the Egyptians were nearer eight million than the Israelites were to two million. Here is one of many instances where a foolish man has thought it "wise" to fight against God. Rameses II. thought he could diminish what God was multiplying. So Haman thought and Nebuchadnezzar and Nero. But everywhere "the blood of the martyrs has proved the seed of the Church. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" As the envy and greed of Joseph's brothers, and the very lies of Potiphar's wife were overruled to hasten Joseph's progress to high office, so we shall see how the Israelites, who would no doubt have remained in Egypt if the prosperity they enjoyed in Joseph's time had continued, were driven like eaglets out of their nest by the afflictions that stirred them up to flight in the time of Moses. Thus their very sorrows hastened their departure to the Land of Promise, as sorrow has often turned men's steps toward heaven.

Brick Bearing Royal Stamp

Some years ago an insane man in a New England town rose from his seat in the midst of a large assembly, and seizing one of the pillars that sustained the gallery of the church, declared aloud that he was going to pull it down. Had another Samson suddenly appeared and declared himself ready to bow between the pillars of another Dagon's temple, there could hardly have been a greater consternation. The people, amid the outcries and faintings and general confusion, yielded to the most foolish fears. Nor did they recover their self-possession and quietly resume their seats until one of their number, significantly pointing to the large and strong pillar which had been threatened, calmly said, "Let him try—let him try." This proposition restored order and confidence at once. The house did not fall, and the services went on. When men fight against God's plans, let us not be alarmed, even though we should be alert. When the infidel or the persecutor threatens to destroy the Church of God, we may well say in confident faith, "Let him try."

The slavery of the Israelites was a less serious slavery than the slavery to false ideas of the Egyptian and other oppressors. In all ages men have been slaves. Slaves one of another. Slaves of appetites and lusts. Slaves of greed and the desire for revenge. But strange as it may seem, there has been no slavery more severe and accursed than the servitude to an idea. Men have started out with false premises, and of course have come to absurd conclusions. But they have said, "We are right," and they have followed their ideas to the bitter end.

Sincere Persecutors

Philip II. of Spain had from infancy heard of the accursedness of heresy. So, when a king, his one delight was to burn those who did not reverence the church. The idea of his life was to exterminate heretics. In following his course he cursed Spain and almost annihilated the Netherlands, but he served the idea to the end. When a young Spanish noble passed by on his way to the stake he cried, "O king, how can you look on and see me burned?" To which the king replied, "I would carry the wood to burn my own son were he as wicked as you."

"The more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied." God's love more than checkmated man's hate. The Israelites not only grew in numbers but also in strength. While Rameses II. was forcing them to build his store cities, he was unconsciously training them to build Jerusalem. In individual lives, how often it has proved true, the more he was afflicted, the more his graces were multiplied and revealed graces of sympathy, of strength, of patience, of courage.

"Never mind, mudder. Don't cry. Lots of kids gets jobs settin' down." This actual utterance of a little child worker, when taken to a hospital to have his legs amputated after a bad street accident, illustrates better than any words of mine the prevailing spirit of the poor. The boy was ing in agony. He saw his mother c bitterly at his bedside. He mistool tirely the reason for tears. With boy-like u ishness, he looked upo self only as the wage-e of the family. It ac never occurred to hin his mother could be cerned about his pe pain. He saw only the l income, supposed his m was crying for that, an his best, in his crude, boy way, to comfort h

Grace From Suffering

When the Pilgrims at Plymouth fighting the cold, burying their watching against the Indians, with "p of nothing but Gospel," they might said: "What is the use of all this suff on a bleak shore far from home? We as well lie down and die." Little did know that God was creating a rep

On the last that we heard the late Dr. Fuller pr he read the passage in Isaiah: "They run and not be weary; they shall walk not be faint;" and then he added, puts walking last because it is hard It is really much easier to run in the L work than to walk. It is easier to the high horse, attending meetings evening, and speaking at each, inspire the time by crowds and by sympathy, it is to discharge patiently, without ex ment, the prosaic, every-day duties o ligion.

HINA'S FAMINE CRISIS NEAR

"THE IMMEDIATE NEED IS GREAT," THE SHANGHAI COMMITTEE CABLES

AT the severest pinch is now rapidly approaching in China's great famine is made clear by the action taken at a great meeting of foreigners in hai, which issued to the charitable world an appeal, stance of which is given below. This meeting, was a most representative one, was held on the the great Missionary Conference, assembled for rpose of celebrating the Centen- f Christian Missions in China.

r 400 foreigners were present, enting every denomination and all of Protestant missionary work. ally all of the leading missionaries ed in China at the present time in attendance. From the cable ches, it appears that the meeting pecially called for the purpose of sing the prevailing famine. Relief was fully considered, and the nent part taken by the readers of ournal in that work was fittingly nized. After hearing several ad- s, and at the close of a prolonged ession on all the facts presented, the ving appeal was adopted:

"Authoritative reports force us to nize that the worst part of the he period will be from now until st time, and that two and one-half n starving persons are not yet ed by the Relief Committee.

We express our thanks to the Amer- people for aid sent, and to the Red s Society, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD others in America, and to Consul gers of Shanghai for aid in collect- and forwarding relief.

We appeal to America for large tions to meet immediate needs. ghtage and supervision of the dis- ution of gifts are assured."

rom the latest cable dispatches, it is ent that the Chinese government is ing herculean efforts to check the ine. Thus far, owing chiefly to the of system, and the difficulty of transportation, the result has been to reach the more accessible locali- , while remote sufferers are left to perish.

n a letter to Mr. John Havemeyer, Yonkers, N. Y., sionary W. P. Chalfant writes from Hsuchowfu, ngsu Province, giving interesting details of the ef work. He says:

have come down to this large city in Kiangsu Province, 100 s southwest of Ichowfu, to engage in the work of famine relief. esponse to an appeal from the Shanghai Relief Committee, ral of us at Ichowfu volunteered and it was decided that Dr. ts and I should come. We found the resident missionaries of American Presbyterian Church (South) busily engaged in in- ting the city and suburbs, preparatory to distributing the erican flour purchased in Shanghai, and slowly making its way he Canal. Two young brethren of the American Episcopal sion arrived a few days after we did. Dr. Fouts was subse- ntly transferred to Suchien, his place being taken by Mr. mpson of our Shantung Mission.

he inspection of the city just completed was carried on by t committees of the Protestants, French Catholics and native try. It was necessary to enter each home on the official lists, make personal inspection of its condition. In this work we e for the past two weeks been tramping the streets and alleys he city, seeing sights and smelling smells which no pen could cribe. We have put on our lists no fewer than nine thousand ilies in the city and suburb.

he arduous work of distribution began last Tuesday from a e temple in the centre of the city. The flour is sold at about f market price. To cases of special destitution (noted on the kets we gave out), a large piece of bean-cake (the residue from process of making bean-oil, not usually used for food at all), is en without charge. The crush at the temple gates is tremen- us, requiring a force of soldiers to regulate it. Flour tickets are d in the outer court, and the flour is weighed out in the second rt, the purchasers passing out through a rear door. We are ving from one thousand to two thousand persons (that is, nilies) per day, giving out from three to six tons of flour per day doing so. The scene at the distributing centre in full activity one never to be forgotten.

We are trying to organize work on sundry bad places in the burban streets, in order to employ some of the idle men and ve them cash to buy flour. I am taking a special interest in that rm of relief, but I may be sent to the terribly destitute country st of here, to open a new centre of distribution.

The streets are full of beggars and refugees in desperate straits. e dare not so much as speak a sympathetic word, lest we pre- pitate a regular riot. The other day I was seized by a frantic oman, who was wheeling the corpse of her husband on a barrow, d could hardly escape from her clutches. It is fearful!

Mr. John S. Dooly, manager of the mercantile firm f Dunning & Co., Shanghai, writes to his father, Rev. ohn Dooly, a former city missionary in New York: "You have, of course, heard of the terrible famine aging in the northern part of this province. If the terior were opened with railways, these famines would be impossible, as one part of the empire could feed other parts when necessary. But there is no speedy way of transporting grain to the needy districts from the other parts of China. As a result, much of the food now needed will have to be imported from abroad and be taken in steamers as near as possible to the famine districts. From there it will be a slow and tedious journey to the people who are dying daily by the hundreds for lack of food. Most of the sufferers are from the rural districts, the very backbone of the nation. Their fields were flooded, their crops perished; hence they are without food. Even if they have money they cannot buy, for there is nothing to be bought in their own districts."

One of the Thousands of Families Receiving Relief in Suchien

The foregoing concisely expresses the situation, which the missionaries are now endeavoring to relieve. Food must be taken from Shanghai and Chinkiang, and in order to procure a sufficiency for their more extended operations, the missionaries need all the financial assistance that can be given them. "The next six weeks," Secretary McCrea of the Chinkiang Committee cables, "will witness the greatest crisis of the famine. On the arrival of the Buford with her cargo of flour, the situation will be greatly relieved, and meanwhile the $50,000 cabled from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund will enable them to carry on the life-saving campaign vigorously."

Reduced to Skeletons by Long Hunger

Contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Fund, which has already been the means of saving several hundred thousand lives, continue to pour in from all the States. Many of the letters are extremely touching. In one case, five convicts in the Connecticut State Prison—three of them life prisoners—raised a gift of nine dollars for the starving Chinese. Churches, Sunday Schools, Bible classes, and patriotic and social organizations are uniting heartily in the movement. The Central Presbyterian Church, of Rochester, N. Y., has raised about $150 for the "flour fund."

The Rev. Wm. Jay Peck of Corona, N. Y., forwards $58 as the offering of the Union Evangelical Church of Corona, for the relief of the sufferers. Mr. S. J. Sedgwick, of Winfield, N. Y., now in his eighty-fourth year, sends a gift of $7, and writes: "May our Father's blessing attend all efforts for them."

Many donors prefer to remain anonymous. Two checks for $500 each were received on the same day from contributors in New York City, both of whom expressly requested that their names be withheld. These are only a few of many who prefer to give their alms in secret.

Mr. J. I. Wood, Gardner, Mass., sends this interesting letter:

> I enclose $75 towards the relief fund for China. I think two simple facts should be stated: A young man who has read the articles in our Daily News conceived the plan of having an entertainment consisting of games, basket-ball and music by our town band. All but the use of the town hall were given toward the cause. The net proceeds were $36.40. An old couple just ready for the poor house, both too ill to earn their own living, sent ten cents, feeling assured that even the best of the stricken Chinese were worse off than they were. These checks make our total to you $256.22.

A number of residents of Waldrip, Tex., contributed $6 to the Relief Fund which they forwarded through D. W. Hill, Jr. A little eight-year-old miss of Cardinal, Va., Frances Ethel Diggs, raised $1, the result of a collection, and she sends it with this note: "I feel sorry for those little starving children and I want to try and help them, even if it is a little." Mrs. H., Hyndsville, N. Y., sends 50 cents "with a prayer that it may help to save some life." "May God bless this small gift for Jesus' sake," writes A. A. A., Broolen, Minn. ($1). H. C. Achenbach, postmaster at Clay Centre, Kan., sends a list of contributions (including his own), with $16. Mr. E. E. Hubbard sends $2 contributed by readers of El Cristiano Pentecostes, Cuba. In forwarding $2, Mrs. C. H. W., Fairfax, Vt., writes: "How can we, who possess abundance for all our needs, turn a deaf ear to their cries? Should the hearts of all who hear respond, even though the gifts be small, the aggregate will be large, and God only knows the number of lives that may be saved thereby." The Lutheran Church of Hollidaysburg, Pa., sends $7.15 through Mr. S. M. Crisman, who also encloses $2.15 from a family of the same place. Friends in Wildwood, Fla., through W. W. Reid, send $3.35, a village contribution. The Reformed Presbyterian Church of Denison, Kan., sends $5 through its treasurer, J. L. Wright. Miss Ruby F. H., of Glen Avon, Ill., sends $5 with the prayer that "the Lord will bless it for the good of those that are suffering." Mrs. J. J. S. sends $14.50, of which $7.85 is from the Presbyterian Mission, and the balance a town collection. The Y. P. S. C. E. of the First Presbyterian Church, Ellensburg, Wash., sends $10 through Miss Edna C.

These are extracts from only a few of many thousands of letters, almost all of which breathe the same spirit of generous Christian kindness. Many of the writers add a prayer to their gifts, for the material and spiritual salvation of the sufferers.

All contributions should be addressed to CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Fund, 92 Bible House, New York. Every contribution, however small, will be acknowledged in this paper. Recent contributions will be found acknowledged elsewhere in this issue.

TALKS WITH NERVOUS WOMEN

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THOUSANDS of women break down in the midst of their years because their nervous energy is so depleted that they cannot carry life's burdens without pain and distress. Either they grow depressed and suffer unspeakably from melancholia, or they are irritable and unreasonable and cannot adjust themselves to the problems that meet them in the family and among their friends. Sometimes the nervous trouble takes the form of apprehension, and the victims are in constant fear that something is going to happen to themselves or their children. Sometimes they cannot sit quietly anywhere, either at home or in a public meeting. They must be continually in motion.

Few women escape the occasional torture of a nervousness that compels them to keep feet or hands in motion, and that makes them feel as if they should fly to pieces if they are suddenly called or unexpectedly confronted with some terrible creature, as, for instance, a mouse or a beetle. Only she whose nerves are always at poise is ready at all times to meet and face the unexpected, and she it is who walks bravely through life because she bears about with her an invincible armor of perfect health.

Let me suppose that you to whom I am talking belong to the great company of women whose nerves are out of gear. You may not as yet have neurasthenia or neuritis or any other affection for which the doctors prescribe change of scene, rest-cures, or pills and potions. But you are on the high-road to physical wreckage. Unless nature calls a halt, you will soon be obliged to go to a sanitarium. What can you do at the moment to save yourself precious time, a good deal of money and no little suffering? The question is a pertinent one and goes with force to a host of tired-out women. Put a little emphasis on the phrase tired out. There are two kinds of fatigue. There is the kind that is healthful and that promotes every night a good night's rest. When one has been able to do a day's work without more than the fatigue that by right comes to brain and muscles at the end of the day, the quality of sleep that follows is refreshing and invigorating. It is the balmy sleep that knits the raveled sleeve of care and is really tired nature's sweet restorer.

Often a woman grows far too tired for this gentle and beneficial sleep, and, although slumber overtakes her, it is disturbed and does her little good, or the fiend of insomnia perches on her pillow and laughs in demoniac glee as her ears count the strokes of successive hours, and she lies with wide-open eyes staring into the darkness.

When you or I reach this point we have become tired out, too tired to be altogether relieved from the strain by a single night of sleep or day of inaction.

Many a time illness so dreaded by the busy wife and mother slips over the threshold a blessing in disguise. Tied hand and foot by illness, the housekeeper who has been called upon by every one from her husband to the baby for constant ministries, being laid aside, must be waited upon, and herself be transformed into an object of solicitude and care.

There are women who get their only intervals from drudgery in occasional periods of sickness, and they may afterward look back to the chamber of pain as Maggy in Little Dorrit looked back to the hospital; the chamber of pain has been to them a heavenly place.

Is it not a good plan to take note of the symptoms that precede the final ebb of strength, and secure at least a little rest by way of precaution? In other words, rest before you are tired out. Watch for the thin place in the cord of life, the thin place where the break is most likely to come.

If you are a martyr to headache, seek the cause. If dyspepsia has you in its clutches, ascertain what mistakes you make and try whether you cannot by diet or by a different routine of cooking vanquish this danger. If you are aware that you are cross and fretful, hateful to yourself and disagreeable to others, or if you are morbid and melancholy, all because you have forgotten the weak point and have let yourself drift into the region where you are tired to the last drop in your blood, stop just where you are. The case is one for prayer, but it is also one for pains. Let the work drop out of your hands. Should it drop altogether and you have to lie down permanently in the refuge of many a tired woman, the grave, somebody else would pick it up and carry it on. Let somebody else pick it up now. Let neither the cooking, the scrubbing, the sewing nor the mending enlist your attention when your plain duty is to sit in a sunny window with folded hands, or to stroll out in God's open air and let nature heal and comfort you. Far better be less pernickety about the house and the children, and let the good man sit down to plainer meals, than to keep on till the house is turned into a funeral assembly, and flowers hang on the door-bell. Flowers in the garden that you love to cultivate are more to the purpose than garlands and wreaths sent in memoriam. Certainly, this should be your point of view. For one nervous woman who is capricious and selfish, there are hundreds who are suffering through their unselfishness and their devotion to mistaken ideals of duty. You can do much more for your children, your husband and your friends if you are well than if you are ill.

Another point. Avoid stimulants and narcotics, and observe the greatest caution as to taking amateur prescriptions. Every friend and acquaintance has a remedy that has proved invaluable in her experience. No doubt in a sort of hit-or-miss fashion, amateur prescriptions occasionally do good, but the safe rule is never to take drugs and never to tamper with alcoholic beverages, medicinally or otherwise, unless a doctor tells you to do so. The whole range of headache powders, sleeping tablets and strengthening bitters is dangerous to the last degree. They may afford apparent temporary relief, but they never touch the root of the trouble, and they sometimes hasten death.

There are nervous women who are broken down by intense absorption in church work or by the swift pace of society. They have paid and received too many visits. They have been worried and flurried over dressmaking and millinery, and in the effort to maintain the same style as their neighbors, they have spent too money. This is the trouble with American wome sacrifice themselves on the altar of society. Equ is the trouble with women who bear the burden visiting, the raising of funds and the round of me inevitable in a working church. The burden divided among all; it is borne by a few. Present few break down and become nervous. I shall more to say on this subject another week.

A NOVEL PLAYGROUND

A CANAL-BOAT is in these days of hurry and rush an image of old-fashioned leisure and tranquillity. As it slowly passes with its freight or its passengers, people on the banks turn to admire its easy-going progress. In the winter a fleet of canal-boats is laid up in New York Harbor, waiting for the spring. The interior in our picture shows a novel playground for children who find in the roomy quarters of the old boat plenty of scope for their games, and accommodation for their toys.

The Hard Side of Good People

What a pity it is that in very good people there i a painful lack of that sweet charity that sufferet and is kind. People who have never been tempte little patience and much contempt for the weak those who battle with temptation and find it too for them. There are natures, lovable, gentle and co sionate, that are deficient in moral stamina and ar feted by adverse winds and beaten struggle as life goes on. Sometimes herited craving for stimulants, or a yielding to narcotics under the str pain, undermines the foundations of acter. Before the victim is awake his danger, the mischief is fatally Backward steps are not easy when o gone far on the road to ruin. A Household Account

A young wife beginning married with a husband who wishes her to full charge of her part of their com business is envied by some of her n bors because on the first day of month her husband places in her ha sum of money sufficient to pay the expenses of the home. She personall her own check pays the landlord, butcher, the grocer, the milkman and other purveyors of the household. feeling quite sure in the matter, young woman inquires whether she shall sign checks Mrs. John Smith or simply Mary Smith. money will be deposited in the bank to the cred Mary Smith, and this is the name she must sign in business transaction. If she draws a check to her order, she may make it payable to cash, sign it Smith, and, turning it over, endorse it Mary Smit the other side.

If the young housewife is careful to enter every c drawn in her check book, keeping her stubs with exactn she will always know precisely what she has in b Once a month or, if she prefer, once a quarter, should have her book balanced at the bank. checks that she has sent out will then be returne her, and she should not destroy them for at least a twe month, each voucher being a receipt for money actu paid.

Wherever practicable, husbands and wives should a this plan of carrying on their home affairs. A little perience would show the merits of this way of d things. A great deal of friction would be saved, and plan would prove in most cases to be thoroughly s factory, besides being economical.

endall did not know what she ave done without the doctor.

It was nearly midnight when New York was reached, and there was nothing for them to do but to go to the hotel; for, in spite of her impatience, Mrs. Kendall well knew that it was too late for anything else to be done that night.

She tried to sleep. She told herself that she needed rest for the morrow; but always before her eyes was the little blue-eyed, yellow-haired girl she had left in the station so long ago, and always there was a flood of questions that had no answer.

Would Margaret know her mother? Had she forgotten her? What had these three years brought to her? Had she suffered? Had she been unhappy? Had she ever been—hungry? Mrs. Kendall shuddered and clenched her fingers until the nails bit into the palms of her hands at the thought.

There was no time lost in the morning, and at the earliest possible moment Mrs. Kendall, the doctor, and the nurse were on their way to the address given in Sadie's letter.

As the streets grew narrower and dirtier, and the houses poorer, Mrs. Kendall's distress and horror found expression in shuddering glances and exclamations; and when the long dark stairs that led to the attic tenement were reached, she moaned:

"Oh, doctor, how she must have suffered—how she must have suffered! My poor darling!"

There was scarcely a word of introduction or explanation after Mrs. McGinnis had opened the door before Mrs. Kendall spoke. The mother love and patience had been strained to the breaking point, and would not longer be held in check. Sweeping the poor little room with eager eyes, Mrs. Kendall cried:

"The little blue-eyed, yellow-haired girl that came to you three years ago—where is she? Where is she?"

The woman opposite looked dazed and almost frightened. She shook her head.

"I don't know, madam," she said.

"You don't know!"

"No, madam. She didn't stay but a week, and I've never seen her since."

There was a low, sobbing cry.

"Quick—some water!" cried the doctor, sharply, as he caught Mrs. Kendall's swaying form. "She has fainted."

A Brahman's Opinion

LISTENING to an address of David McConaughy, Secretary of the Forward Movement of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, the writer heard him relate an incident with which she thinks the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be familiar. It was given as a graphic illustration of "applied" Christianity, as well as a concrete example of the vivid contrast between the latter and Hinduism. The occasion was the arrival in India of the vessel loaded with breadstuffs for the famine-stricken people of India, and sent out by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He said that standing near him was a high-caste Brahman—a man occupying an exalted social position. As he looked at the ship he was wonderfully moved, and his terse and suggestive verdict was, "That is the greatest sermon in behalf of Christianity that could be preached," the tears, meanwhile, rolling down his cheeks.

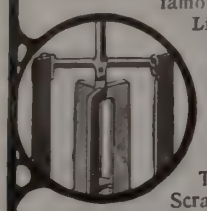
Lightning Freezer

The object in building the Lightning Freezer is not simply to supply you with a purer ice cream than factory-made, but a richer, smoother and more economically frozen dessert than any you can buy. The famous Wheel Dasher of the Lightning, for instance, works but part of the cream at a time, thereby increasing the bulk, improving the quality and assuring lightness.



The Automatic Twin Scrapers scrape the side of the can free of all frozen particles and prevent snowy or lumpy cream.

Couple with these features a durable pail held together by electric-welded wire hoops that can't fall off, and a drawn steel bottom that won't leak or fall out. In combination these points of superior construction assure a freezer that will last for years, and give excellent service all the while.

Write for a copy of "Frozen Sweets," by Mrs. S. T. Rorer. It gives the newer recipes for ice creams and other frozen desserts; also tells how to make two kinds of ice cream in one freezer at the same time.

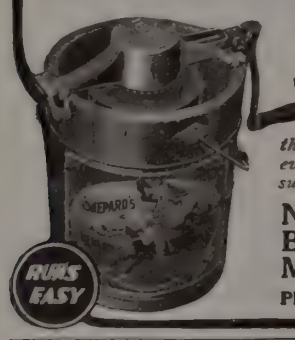

Insist on having the Lightning; every dealer can supply it.

Questions and Answers

W. M. B., Utica, Miss. As there is no difference in the height of the water level of the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, where will the water supply come from to raise vessels over the locks in the Panama Canal?

It will be supplied by reservoirs placed at intervals, as has been done with many canals, though on a smaller scale, here in America.

L. E. H., Dayton, O. What did Christ mean by saying that in heaven men would be as the angels (Luke 20: 36)?

Christ made the statement in replying to a question of the Sadducees about a woman who had had seven husbands. He said that the marriage relation did not exist in heaven. Marriage being designed to preserve the race, which would otherwise end by death, will not be needed when death is abolished. It does not imply that human affection will disappear in heaven, but that the conception of marriage implied in the question would not continue when the physical body was transformed into the spiritual body.

H. S. S., Winchester, Conn. 1. The geography says that at the poles they have six months' day and six months' night. How much actual sunshine have they there? 2. How do you reconcile the conflicting accounts in Matt. 27: 3-5 and Acts 1: 18? 3. How long was Noah building the ark?

1. The long polar day has its alternations of sunshine and shadow, stormy and fine, wet and dry, cold and less cold, etc. To ascertain the proportion of polar sunshine, you should write to the National Geographic Magazine, Washington, D. C., for all information. 2. Commentators do not regard these passages, which relate to the death of Judas, as irreconcilable. The two accounts of the traitor's end differ only in this: that in Acts the details are given from the lips of Peter while yet fresh in his memory, whereas Matthew, writing long after the event, mentions the end of Judas in general terms only. 3. All speculation on the subject is useless. The only passage which has been regarded as throwing any possible light on the matter is Gen. 6: 3, and it is not at all certain that this means that Noah had 120 years in which to build the ark.

J. F. J. M., Fresno, Calif. Have the two saloons in the Capitol at Washington been abolished or closed? If so, under which President's administration did it occur? Who started the movement?

Rev. Dr. Alexander Alison, General Secretary National Temperance Society, New York, replies to the foregoing as follows: "The two saloons have been abolished. On December 9, 1903, the U. S. Senate agreed to the provision in the Immigration Bill prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol. In securing the passage of this bill the National Temperance Society was specially active, and also in defeating the efforts of the War Department and the liquor interests to reopen the Army beer saloon—the canteen."

H. N. H., Stonybrook, Mass. 1. How does the earth's orbit revolve? Does it describe, as it were, a sphere—like a spiral folded upon itself, with 109,000 turns? 2. Which way does it revolve? 3. Do the orbits of all the planets revolve similarly?

Motion seems to be almost an attribute of matter, for there is not an atom of matter in the vast universe that is not in motion. The earth rotates once a day and revolves once a year and, strange to think, its orbit also revolves once in 25,700 years. The sun also rotates in about twenty-six days, and doubtless revolves, but around what object or in what time is unknown and probably will remain unknown for thousands of years, and possibly will never be known while our home is here. As the sun is 93,000,000 miles distant, its orbit diameter is therefore 186,000,000 miles. Nearly all we know about it is that it and the entire solar system are moving at the rate of about twelve miles a second nearly toward that bright star, Alpha Lyræ (Vega); whether its path be round or straight is unknown. The reader must understand that all this has nothing to do with the revolution of the earth's orbit, which revolves from east to west. As the orbit revolves the earth must go with it. Its poles pointing to the sky could, if reaching it, mark on it a circle slightly elliptical, passing different stars that happen to be in or near its path and at the present time pointing near what we call the north polar star. In 13,000 years hence it will point nearly toward Alpha Lyræ, but will be some six degrees from the pole. Every 12,900 years this motion changes the equinox. It seems as if the cause of this strange motion ought to be at least alluded to. The earth's diameter through its equator is twenty-six and one-half miles farther than through its poles, caused by its rotation when in a plastic condition, as water is thrown from a rapidly rotating grindstone. The attraction of sun and moon (especially the moon) causes this precessional motion.

Marathon, N. Y. LEWIS SWIFT.

J. W. C., Lexington, N. C. You say that the body of the Pharaoh of the oppression is now in an Egyptian museum. Was he not drowned in the Red Sea? His body would have rotted long ago.

The Pharaoh of the oppression was not drowned in the Red Sea (see Ex. 2: 23, where his death is recorded). His body was embalmed as only the Egyptians knew how to embalm; it was put in a sculptured chamber with his name and titles duly inscribed on it. It has been found and is now, as we said, in the museum. That was Rameses II. It was his son Menepthah, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, who is supposed to have been drowned in the Red Sea. That, however, is doubtful. Such a man as Menepthah was would be likely to stay on dry land and send his army on to take the risk. Some of the inscriptions on the rocks, recently deciphered, appear to imply that he was not drowned, but lived to a later date. The Israelitish poets, writing many years afterward, naturally included him in the catastrophe, but such a passage as Ps. 136: 15 is not to be regarded as an historical record.

A recent article in this journal has awakened interest in the question of who holds the record for longest continuous service as Sunday School superintendent. Mr. H. M. H., Frankfort, O., writes:

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 5, you called attention to the long time service of Sunday School teachers, and invited other experiences. Mr. D. C. Anderson of this place (Frankfort, O.), the senior elder of the Presbyterian Church, called a Bible class together in 1848, and from then until this date has continuously taught the Bible class. The longest vacation he has taken was when he was at the World's Sunday School Convention at Jerusalem, in 1904. The care and watchfulness of the man in his faithful record kept of each member in his class can hardly be duplicated in Sunday School history.

J. W. T., Claremont, Canada, writes:

Mr. Robert Gordon, Tweed, Ontario, Canada, has held the position of Sunday School superintendent for fifty-eight years without a break. In a note from him to me, he makes the following statement: "I was elected superintendent of the Sunday School on April 1, 1849, and have been there ever since." This school is three miles out of Tweed. Mr. Gordon formerly lived there, but now resides in Tweed, but still takes charge of the school there. During my four years' pastorate on that circuit, I found him one of the most faithful workers I have met during my ministry. Although Mr. Gordon is now advanced in years, yet his interest in the Sunday School is in no way diminished.

E. M. O., Ante, Va.; G. V. D., Carrollton, O. and others. 1. Does God create evil as Isaiah says (Isa. 45: 7)? 2. Why did Paul forbid women speaking in the church (I. Cor. 14: 34)?

1. God does not create evil in the sense in which we use the word, but it was true as Isaiah wrote it. He had the Oriental habit of making his sentences contrasting couplets, as you may notice in the Proverbs (see Prov. 13: 1-13). He contrasts peace and war and says the Lord is sovereign over both. He sends peace, which to Israel was good, and he sends war, which to them was evil. Isaiah taught that all national events were God's dealing with the obedient or disobedient nation. They were to regard both peace and war, prosperity or adversity, as coming from God's hand. 2. It was necessary in Corinth at that time to save the new church from scandal. The people of Corinth would have thought a woman speaking in public a bold, shameless creature, and Paul, following his usual course, tried to avoid causing prejudice. It does not apply in these times.

B. M., New Albany, Kan. I have heard that the Bible gives account of two temperance societies or organizations. Can you tell me what they are?

We suppose you refer to the Nazarites and the Rechabites. The law of the Nazarites is contained in Num. 6: 1-4. Samson was a Nazarite (see Judges 13: 7). The Rechabites are mentioned in Jer. 35: 6.

Mr. Coghill's very interesting letter ...shows how history repeats itself. Thus, ...some 2,200 years ago, we have the accouut ...of a relief movement, in which both ...money and grain are the chief constitu- ents, as they are to-day in our life-saving work in China and elsewhere. The rich men of old seem to have been more liber- ally disposed towards humanitarian work than some of our modern Crœsuses.

Inquirer, Norwich, Conn. Is it possible for God to convert a sinner in answer to prayer, if the sinner himself be unwilling?

Yes, we think so. He does not convert the sinner while he is unwilling, but he leads him to become willing. As the Psalmist says (Psalm 110: 3): "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power." If God can make his people willing, he can make the sinner willing. Paul, who by the way was a specimen of men made willing, being stricken down by divine power, intimates that such conversions occur. He says (Rom. 10: 20), quoting Isaiah, "I was found of them that sought me not."

A Bright Career Ended

John Goldsmith Prall, only son of Mr. and Mrs. John H. Prall, of Elmhurst, Long Island, N. Y., died very suddenly on Monday, April 22, 1907, aged twenty-five years, his father being absent at Camden, S. C., at the time. Mr. Prall was a student of Columbia University, and was greatly beloved by all who knew him for his sterling Christian character. He was much interested in church work, being a teacher in the Sunday School of the old Newtown Presbyterian Church, of which his father has been superintendent for many years, and of which his grandfather, the late John P. Prall, was previously superintendent for a long period. His maternal grandfather, Rev. John Goldsmith, was a former pastor of the same church for thirty-five years. At the very outset of a promising career, God has taken him to himself. The lesson for us is that, even in youth, we should be ready for the summons. That this young man, so splendidly equipped for God's service, was an active worker in the Master's vineyard, is in this hour of bereavement a source of consolation to the parents, who may now say in their hearts: "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord!"

FRIENDS HELP

St. Paul Park Incident.

"After drinking coffee for breakfast I always felt languid and dull, having no ambition to get to my morning duties. Then in about an hour or so a weak, nervous derangement of the heart and stomach would come over me with such force I would frequently have to lie down.

"At other times I had severe headaches; stomach finally became affected and digestion so impaired that I had serious chronic dyspepsia and constipation. A lady, for many years State President of the W. C. T. U., told me she had been greatly benefited by quitting coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. She was troubled for years with asthma. She said it was no cross to quit coffee when she found she could have as delicious an article as Postum.

"Another lady, who had been troubled with chronic dyspepsia for years, found immediate relief on ceasing coffee and beginning Postum two a day. Still another friend told me that Postum Food Coffee was a Godsend to her, her heart trouble having been relieved after leaving off coffee and taking on Postum.

"So many such cases came to my notice that I concluded coffee was the cause of my trouble and I quit and took up Postum. I am more than pleased to say that my days of trouble have disappeared. I am well and happy." "There's a reason." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

A Fascinating Prose Idyl*

VERY seldom does one meet a book so natural and refreshing or a character so quaint and love-compelling as one finds in Aunt Jane of Kentucky. The author in these pages touches the meridian of excellence. We are introduced to Aunt Jane, a dear old matron of four-score, who has the blithe heart and the merry laugh of a child notwithstanding her years, and as we sit beside her in the sunny kitchen, or on her veranda, she entertains us with charming reminiscences of the past. The book is one of those that alternately make the reader laugh and cry, but the tears are never distressing nor is the laughter tinged with malice. The strongest sketches in the book are perhaps the opening chapter, "Sally Ann's Experience," and the later story of "Mary Andrews' Dinner." These would be spoiled by quotation.

The quality of the book is shown by two gems taken from the chapter called "Aunt Jane's Album," and the one which gathers up in a fragrant bouquet the memories of Aunt Jane's garden. In no recent fiction is there found united quite so much sterling common sense and so much rollicking fun.

These stories are told by Aunt Jane to a girl friend who sits beside her and remembers the tales for future use:

The Quilt Pattern From Europe

There was a quilt hanging over the foot of the bed that had about it a certain air of distinction. It was a solid mass of patchwork, composed of squares, parallelograms, and hexagons. The squares were of dark gray and red-brown, the hexagons were white, the parallelograms black and light gray. I felt sure that it had a history that set it apart from its ordinary fellows.

"Where did you get the pattern, Aunt Jane?" I asked. "I never saw anything like it."

The old lady's eyes sparkled, and she laughed with pure pleasure.

"That's what everybody says," she exclaimed, jumping up and spreading the favored quilt over two laden chairs, where its merits became more apparent and striking. "There ain't another quilt like this in the State o' Kentucky, or the world, for that matter. My granddaughter Henrietta, Mary Frances' youngest child, brought me this pattern from Europe."

She spoke the words as one might say "from Paradise," or "from Olympus," or "from the lost Atlantis." "Europe" was evidently a name to conjure with, a country of mystery and romance unspeakable. I had seen many things from lands beyond the sea, but a quilt pattern from Europe! Here at last was something new under the sun. In what shop of London or Paris were quilt patterns kept on sale for the American tourist?

"You see," said Aunt Jane, "Henrietta married a mighty rich man, an' jest as good as he's rich, too, and they went to Europe on their bridal trip. When she come home she brought me the prettiest shawl you ever saw. She made me stand up and shut my eyes, and she put it on my shoulders and made me look in the lookin' glass, and then she says, 'I brought you a new quilt pattern, too, grandma, and I want you to piece one quilt by it and leave it to me when you die.' And then she told me about goin' to a town over yonder they call Florence, and how she went into a big church that was built hundreds o' years before I was born. And she said the floor was made o' little pieces o' colored stone, all laid together in a pattern, and they called it mosaic. And says I, 'Honey, has it got anything to do with Moses and his law?' You know the Commandments was called the Mosaic Law, and was all on tables o' stone. And Henrietta jest laughed, and says she: 'No, grandma; I don't believe it has. But,' says she, 'the minute I stepped on that pavement I thought about you, and I drew this pattern off on a piece of paper and brought it all the way to Kentucky for you to make a quilt by.' Henrietta bought the worsted for me, for she said it had to be jest the colors o' that pavement over yonder, and I made it that very winter."

Aunt Jane was regarding the quilt with worshipful eyes, and it really had an effective combination of color and form.

"Many a time while I was piecin' that," she said, "I thought about the man that laid the pavement in that old church, and wondered what his name was, and how he looked, and what he'd think if he knew there was a old woman here in Kentucky usin' his patterns to make a bedquilt."

It was indeed a far cry from the Florentine artisan of centuries ago to this humble worker in calico and worsted, but between the two stretched a cord of sympathy that made them one—the eternal aspiration after beauty.

Cornfield Versus Garden

Aunt Jane's interests were divided between her house and her garden, and in the latter she had a wonderful rose that her grandmother had brought from Virginia in an iron kettle when the early settlers first came to Kentucky. Grandmother's rose had survived several generations and was blooming in peerless beauty beside the door when Aunt Jane told its story to her friend. The pride of her heart was about equally divided between her daffodils, roses and chrysanthemums, and they all were to her not merely plants, but personalities.

Speaking of her husband she one day said: "It was never his way nor my way in the house, but our way." And she gave a pretty illustration of this wedded friendship in an incident she related apropos of transplanting some daffodils from a neighboring estate. Her pet name for daffodils was Johnny-jump-ups. She shall tell how she added to her store of these favorites:

"Well, as soon as the new man got possession he begun plowin' up the gyarden, and one evenin' the news come to me that he was throwin' away Johnny-jump-ups by the wagon-load. I put on my sunbonnet and went out where Abram was at work in the field, and says I, 'Abram, you've got to stop plowin' and put the horse to the spring wagon and take me over to the old Harris place.' And Abram says, says he, 'Why, Jane, I'd like mighty well to finish this field before night, for it looks like it might rain to-morrow. Is it anything particular you want to go for?'

"Says I, 'Yes; I never was so particular about anything in my life as I am about this. I hear they're plowin' up Old Lady Harris' gyarden and throwin' the flowers away, and I want to go over and git a wagon-load o' Johnny-jump-ups.'

"Abram looked at me a minute like he thought I was losin' my senses, and then he burst out laughin', and says he: 'Jane, who ever heard of a farmer stoppin' plowin' to go after Johnny-jump-ups? And who ever heard of a farmer's wife askin' him to do such a thing?'

"I walked up to the plow and begun to unfasten the trace chains, and says I: 'Business before pleasure, Abram. If it's goin' to rain to-morrow that's all the more reason why I ought to have my Johnny-jump-ups set out to-day. The plowin' can wait till we come back.'

"Of course Abram give in when he saw how I wanted the flowers. But he broke out laughin' two or three times while he was hitchin' up, and says he: 'Don't tell any o' the neighbors, Jane, that I stopped plowin' to go after a load o' Johnny-jump-ups.'

"When we got to the Harris place we found the Johnny-jump-ups lyin' in a gully by the side o' the road, a pitiful sight to anybody that loves flowers and understands their feelin's. We loaded up the wagon with the pore things, and as soon as we got home, Abram took his hoe and made a little trench all around the gyarden, and I set out the Johnny-jump-ups while Abram finished his plowin'."

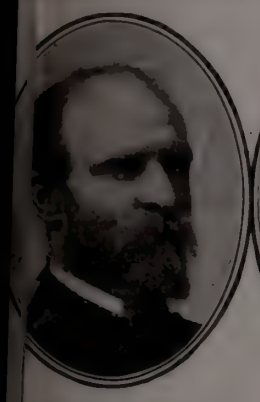
men in several generations have done so ch for medical knowledge and decreased nces of death in surgery as has Lord Lister.



Count Lagercrantz

eightieth birthday has been celebrated re- in Great Britain. His life from his student has been devoted to research, and the result is now part of the medical equipment of vilized nations. Lord Lister was born in n Essex, England, and came rightfully by quiring turn of mind, as his father, Joseph ter, was a scientist of note who made many improvements on icroscope. Young Lister went niversity College, London, e he came under the influence ofessor Sharpe, who aroused ster an interest in physiology has lasted until the present. udied in various schools and became professor in the Uni- ty of Glasgow. Queen Vic- made him a baron. Our nt antiseptic system of the ment of wounds is based on iscovery of proper germicides.

REV. CHARLES F. AKED, D.D., has taken up his work as permanent pastor of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York. The church was crowded on his first Sunday and long lines of people stood in the middle of the street. His first sermon easily convinced his hearers that the church has secured an energetic and intellectual pastor. THE JAMAICA EARTHQUAKE and the controversy between SIR Alexander Swettenham, governor of the island, and Admiral Davis of the American fleet, is still fresh in the public mind. Consequently the enforced resignation of Sir Alexander, and the appointment of Mr. Sydney Olivier, C.M.G., has occasioned no surprise either in Great Britain or this country. Mr. Olivier has made his own way and risen without the backing of family influence. He entered the colonial office twenty-five years ago after passing at the head of the list of candidates. He has been Colonial Secretary of British Honduras and Colonial Secretary of Jamaica. He is a well-known writer on economical subjects. His appointment is considered a happy augury for the future relations of Jamaica and the United States. His task of rebuilding Kingston and restoring confidence in the island is a serious one.

The Descent of the Holy Spirit

By MRS. M. BAXTER

HE purpose for which God has created man is that he may become "a habitation of God through the Spirit" ph. 2: 22). Who can comprehend this ndrous grace of God which unites us himself, which makes man one life, one ing with himself? It is almost incon- vable that the mighty Maker of the iverse should choose anything so small, insignificant in his creation, and make his home, his dwelling-place; that the reator should inhabit the creature! yet it is. God calls man to do godlike ings, to rise out of his own nature into od's, to leave the natural for the super- tural, to renounce and ignore self with l its claims, its rights, its powers, that it ay be replaced by the Holy Spirit.

God calls us to deny and ignore our tural tendency to stand up for our rights y resisting evil, that, by the Spirit, we ay love our enemies; he calls us from the tural self-reliance which belongs to us, cast all our care on God, for he careth r us. He calls us to deny the love of pprobation which dwells in each of our earts by nature, and to be glad when en revile, persecute, and speak all man- er of evil against us falsely, for his ame's sake (Matt. 5: 11, 12). Jesus came live a new life, a kind of life which no an had ever lived before, a life in which elf was unknown, unrecognized, disre- arded; and he has made it possible for ou and me, as we renounce self, and are dwelt by God.

The little band of disciples had been mptied of self. Even the forward Peter, ven the doubting Thomas, were now oc- upied with praising and blessing God, lthough their cause might seem to the yes of man a lost one. They were neither reaching nor healing. Their Master had eft them, their enemies denied the resur- ection of Jesus, yet, strong in faith, they gave glory to God, counting on Jesus' word against all present surroundings and circumstances. And then it was that the blessing came. The day of Pentecost, the time of the offering of the first-fruits (Lev. 23: 15-17) was fully come, and a new order of first-fruits had been offered. "Christ, the first-fruits" (I. Cor. 15: 23) of the resurrection, had ascended into heaven as a true wave-offering unto God, and now his disciples were "a living sacrifice" at his disposal, also "a kind of first-fruits of his creatures" (James 1: 18).

"They were all with one accord in one place." Here was blessed unity, here were no divided interests, and here God could bless. "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing, mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." This was their special need; commissioned to "go . . . into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," they needed other languages, and the first instalment of the power of the Holy Ghost thus coming upon them was the supply of this very need. But they were not masters of the situation; it was not that they were making use of the Holy Spirit; it was that the Holy Spirit was clothing, overpowering and making use of them. We may well believe that they were not long in going out into the streets as God's messengers to the multitude of the precious tidings of salvation, and it is probable that they all spoke with a strong Galilean accent, and the people "were all amazed, and marveled, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these Galileans? And how hear we every man in our own tongue?"

$8,000,000 Gift to Policyholders

FORMER United States Senator John F. Dryden has returned to Newark, N. J., fully recovered from the illness which prompted him to withdraw from the Senatorial contest and has actively resumed business relations. When asked for an expression of opinion as to the effect of radical insurance legislation enacted by the different States during the past few months, Senator Dryden said:

"There has been much new legislation upon the subject of life insurance and many important measures have been passed, while many others are still pending. While it is too early to forecast the future effect of the new laws, the Prudential may be relied upon to meet the situation in a spirit of the utmost fairness. The company has always gone far beyond the mere letter of the law and in a liberal spirit has extended to its policyholders the privileges and advantages of one concession after another. It may be relied upon to continue in this liberal course of action. Statute requirements at the best are merely the declaration of a broad and general principle of administration. In the execution of details, a successful company must necessarily be governed by a higher law than a statute—a moral obligation which calls for the most liberal treatment of the insured, compatible with safety.

"In pursuance of this policy it has been my pleasure to sign to-day an order, in conformity with a resolution passed by the Board of Directors of the Prudential Insurance Company, granting concessions this year to Industrial policyholders in the Prudential who have attained the age of seventy-five years, which will result in relieving holders of a great many thousand policies from the payment of any further premiums. These concessions will cost the Company over $750,000 and a continuance of this new plan of action during the next ten years will mean the paying out to these beneficiaries of over three and one-quarter millions of dollars. These concessions, I understand, will affect proportionately more policies than a similar change in any other Industrial insurance company. Besides those I have explained, we have made other voluntary concessions in the form of increased benefits, cash and mortuary dividends, more liberal paid-up policies, etc., not called for by law or contract. These aggregate over eight million dollars. But even this large amount does not represent all the benefits to accrue to policyholders, for we have still others under consideration which will greatly add to the sum total of the concessions in the near future."

Stewards of Grace*

WE often speak of rich men as stewards, recognizing that their money is not their own, but committed to them that they may use it for the benefit of others. That is the Christian view, in theory at least, if not in practice; but the principle goes further than the possessions. The personal gifts are included in this idea of stewardship. If a man is endowed with some power, with some special capacity, it is incumbent on him if he is a Christian, to use it in the Lord's service. The gift of eloquence, the gift of musical voice, the power to interest children, the gift of good cheer and consolation, the gift of the organizing, administrative faculty, the power of interesting and instructive writing, are all endowments which can be used for the benefit of others and in God's service. In these or in other ways, every man is endowed, and he is bound to make a use of them, which shall be a return to God. In other words, he is a steward of grace. His gifts are not for his own profit or pleasure, but must be treated as a trust, for which he will have to give account.

The New Testament writers represent the Church of Christ as a building on which all may labor. If all Christ's servants were of the same mould the building would be a queer edifice. If all could preach and do nothing else, where would the workers be found? It is by every man's special gifts that the building rises, complete and beautiful in every part. There must be some hewers of wood and drawers of water and the men who do this faithfully have their share in the "Well done." True, they had no special endowment but strength and endurance, but that department is necessary to the building.

The great essential is for every man to have his work and to do that. He should never fret because of another having the work that he thinks he could do better. God opens the way for ability to prove itself. It is better to do the humble work efficiently than to take a higher work and fail in it. Those who do faithfully the small things are generally called when a man is needed for a more responsible and honorable duty. Let us all act so that at the final accounting we do not appear empty-handed with the confession that the talent committed to us has been unproductive, wrapped in a napkin.

Little Faults†

MORE of happiness and unhappiness in our lives depends on little things than we generally realize. As we think of how much depends upon them, we naturally ask whether they are really little. They are little in the sense of being easily acquired and easily corrected, but their results are often serious. Spurgeon used to illustrate his continual insistence on this fact by referring to a journey he took to Edinburgh by rail. The train went at high speed to within forty miles of its destination and then came to a stop. Making inquiry, he learned that a peculiar screw, not so large as a man's little finger, had been lost from the locomotive. It could not be found and its loss rendered one side of the engine useless. The train had to creep along at a rate of five miles an hour in the darkness because of the loss of one little screw. The little defect in the temper or in the character often prevents a man's progress in the world. Many a man has lost situation after situation by never being punctual, or by his untidy habits. The character is like a fine jewel, whose many facets should each be perfect. A ruby that by its size and color should have brought many thousands of dollars, was rejected by the jewelers and finally sold for a comparatively small sum because one of its facets had been fractured. We often hear men say of some famous person, "He is a great man, but—", or, "How charming she would be, if—." The defect is usually a small thing, but it spoils.

What shall we say of little sins? They remind one of a Dutchman who should speak of a little hole in one of his famous dikes. The townsfolk would despise him for speaking of it as little, and would rush to repair it before it became large. The little sin, the occasional lapse, the rare indiscretion, the lie told in a difficulty, grow rapidly into habits, and they make the way to great sins easy. The little rift in the lute that spoils the music is like the little blemish in the character. It was but a little scratch on the workman's hand, but it was neglected until the hand and then the arm became swollen and amputation was necessary.

TRAINED NURSE

Remarks About Nourishing Food.

"A physician's wife gave me a package of Grape-Nuts one day, with the remark that she was sure I would find the food very beneficial, both for my own use and for my patients. I was particularly attracted to the food, as at that time the weather was very hot and I appreciated the fact that Grape-Nuts requires no cooking.

"The food was deliciously crisp and most inviting to the appetite. After making use of it twice a day for three or four weeks, I discovered that it was a most wonderful regenerator. I used to suffer greatly from exhaustion, headaches and depression of spirits. My work had been very trying at times and indigestion had set in.

"Now I am always well and ready for any amount of work, have an abundance of active energy, cheerfulness and mental poise. I have proved to my entire satisfaction that this change has been brought about by Grape-Nuts food.

"The fact that it is predigested is a very desirable feature. I have had many remarkable results by leaving Grape-Nuts to my patients, and I cannot speak too highly of the food. My friends constantly comment on the change in my appearance. I have gained 9 pounds since beginning the use of this food." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville" in pkgs.

THE Unchanging "Holy City"

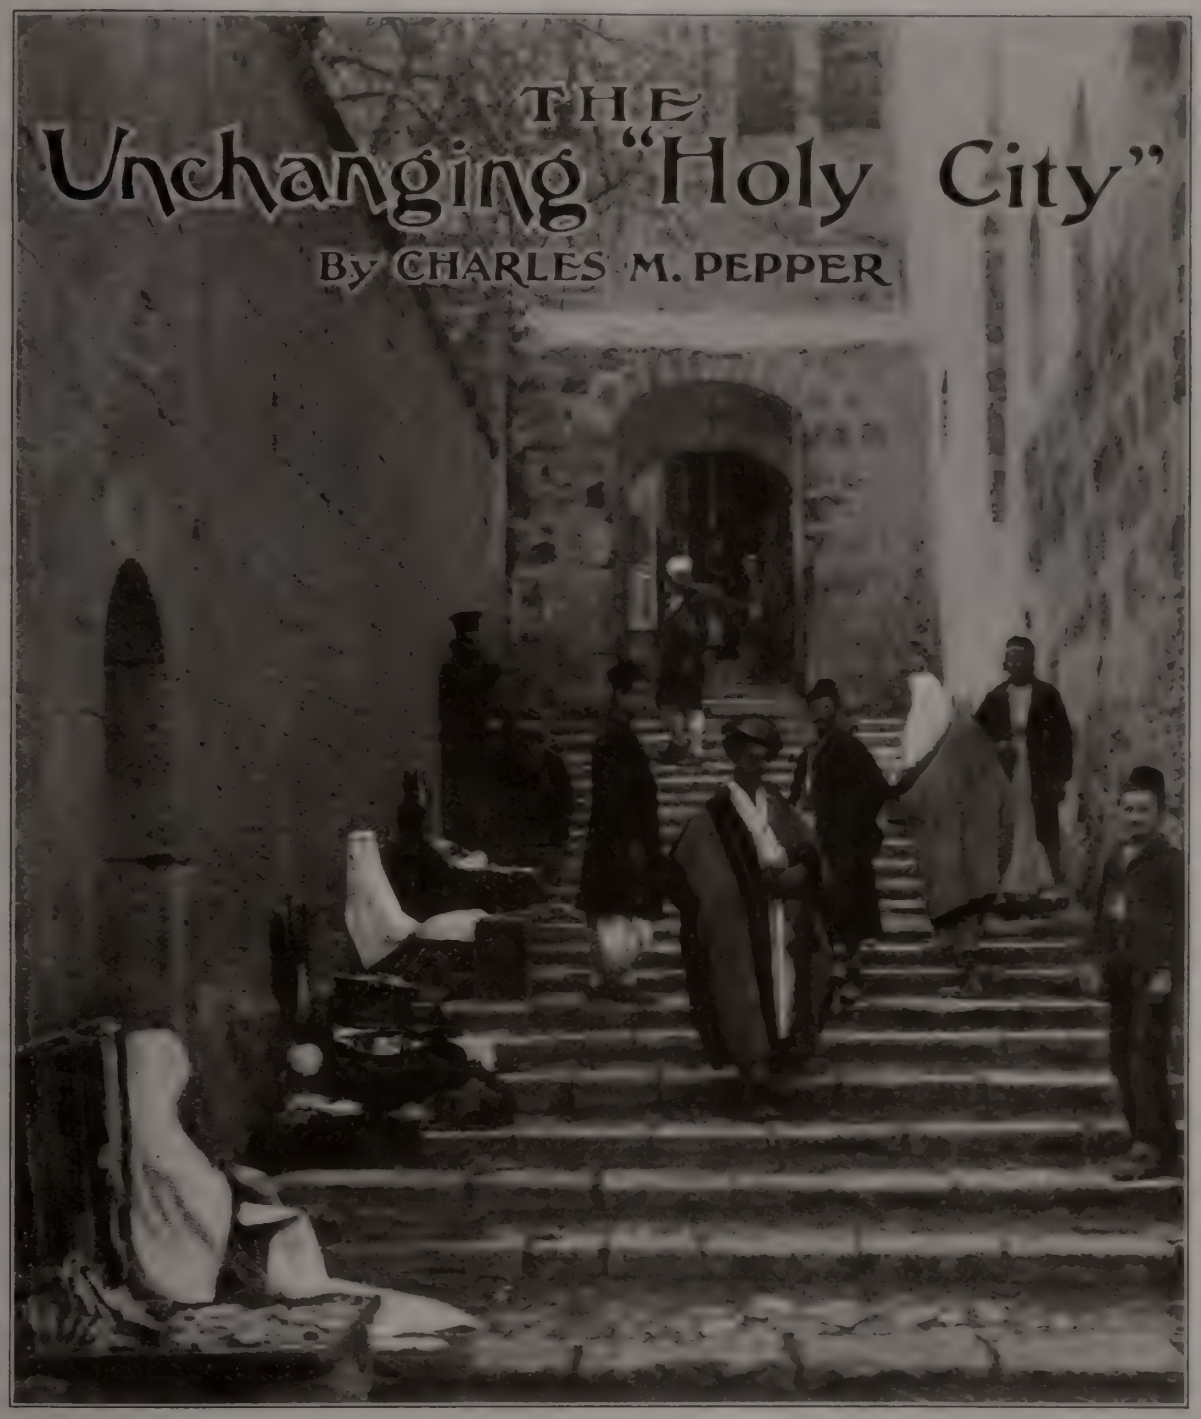
By CHARLES M. PEPPER

IERE are two Jerusalems. One is the unchang- oly City, with its l memories and ciations which evill be the same lions on millions tristian believers. ther, which might lled the Jerusa- f 1907, is the ern city, with ings much like l cities, with wider s than the sacred t and with stately es which are only ally in harmony the architecture e Orient.

e best view of both old and the new ad by driving up hill from which s and his Roman ons attacked the le, and then on e Mount of Olives. m these heights may look down on new town which grown up without walls, regular e-faced buildings red-tiled roofs fill- the slope from the ls to the valley, and n the old Jerusalem hin the walls—the ses with domes, the ne of the Holy ulchre, the dome of Mosque of Omar, minarets, which oken the supremacy the Moslem political wer if not its reli- us supremacy, the ers of the monas- ies, and even the eples of several urches.

That there is a dern Jerusalem out- le the walls is due the fact that the ce within is limited, d during the last arter of a century s new town has wn up. There are nty of people in Jerusalem who remember when there was hardly a building out- e the walls, and when few ventured beyond the Damascus and other gates after htfall. It is not so many years since the gates were closed at night, and no one uld go out or come in. That was one reason why the crowded population of e old Jerusalem did not seek more room on the hills and slopes surrounding the y. But this prohibition was removed and when people could go and come at all urs they began to build their houses where there was less crowding. Another use for the growth of the new town was the development of religious settlements ich began putting up monasteries, hospitals, rest-houses for the accommodation of e pilgrims, and various other institutions. There was little space for them within e city. Now every eligible site is crowned by the building of some religious der or of some European nationality. One of the finest sites is that which was ught by the German Empress and presented for a hospital, a noble memorial of r visit with the Emperor in 1898.

The Turkish government is said to look with disfavor on the purchase of real tate by the various religious societies, backed as they are by the different Euro- an governments, which protect them in all the rights acquired. Whether that so or not, most of the land in the neighborhood of Jerusalem now belongs to for- ners, and this unquestionably will in time have some influence on political affairs.



The Stairway Leading to the Holy Sepulchre, Jerusalem

While much of modern Jerusalem is outside the walls, there is nevertheless something of the new within. Probably the most notable of the new buildings is the Church of St. Saviour, erected through the generosity of the German Emperor. It is a very fine building, which preserves all the traditions and the associations of the Church in the Fatherland. The story of the structure is told in the following inscription:

In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Amen!

This Sanctuary, dedicated to the honor of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, is erected on the site formerly occupied by the Church of St. Mary, belonging to the Knights Hospitalers of the Order of St John at Jerusalem. The remains of the ancient building were for centuries lying about in a heap of ruins, until, in A.D. 1869, the place was presented by the Turkish Emperor to the King of Prussia, afterward William the Great, Emperor of Germany, and was taken possession of in his name by the Crown Prince Frederick William, afterward the Emperor Frederick III. By command of William II., Emperor of Germany and King of Prussia, this church was erected in the years 1893-1898, and in his presence as well as of H. M. the Queen and Empress Augusta Victoria it was solemnly consecrated to the service of God on the 31st of October, 1898. Ps. 26: 8.

I suppose every one on the first visit is most impressed with the medley of races and nationalities which are met with in Jerusalem. It is to-day as it was 1,900 years ago, when there were dwelling at Jerusalem "devout men out of every nation under heaven." It is true also to-day, as it was 2,000 years ago, that there may be heard "every man in his own tongue wherein he was born." Not only "Parthians and Medes, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and strangers of Rome, Cretans and Arabians," but the devout believers in all the Eastern religions of to-day: Orthodox Greeks, Russians, Greek Roman Catholics, Latin Roman Catholics, Syrian Christians, Maronites, Armenians, Abyssinians, Copts, German Lutherans, German Catholics, French Franciscans, Italian Dominicans, British and American Protestants, Turkish Mohammedans and true Jews of Jerusalem.

Nor can a Christian believer fail to regret that in this mingling of different faiths and creeds there is so much that is discordant and out of harmony with the sacred surroundings. The Holy Land is Turkish territory, and one may not be surprised that the Mosque of Omar occupies the site of Solomon's Temple; but that the creeds of the Greek Orthodox, the Coptic, the Armenian, and the Roman Catholic Churches should be shown in divided control of the Holy Sepulchre, while Mohammedan soldiers keep the peace among them, is not a pleasant reflection. One has the same feeling at the Church of the Nativity, where, again, the Moslem soldiers scrupulously guard the grotto in which our Saviour was born, and keep representatives of these different sects from encroaching beyond the limit which has been set aside for each one. THE GRATEFUL LEPER

"And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God"

TRAVELERS tell us that in one of the Eastern States there is a high mountain range and to go from one part of this State to the other you must climb those mountains. The upward pathway bends and winds, now overarched by trees, now under the shadow of some overhanging cliff, but still onward and upward. The wearied traveler, panting and puffing, is too exhausted to look back and see the beautiful valley he has left behind. He keeps saying to himself, "Oh, if I were only at the top, then the rest of my journey would be easy." Suddenly the trees ahead of him abruptly cease and instead of overtopping branches he sees the blue sky rimming the top of the mountain. With a final spurt he reaches the top. There, much to his surprise, upon the summit he finds a rude bench of stone upon which has been carved these words: "Rest and be thankful!" Yes, traveler, rest and be thankful that the hardest part of your toilsome journey is over. But also rest and be thankful because some good kind brother has made for you the stone bench upon which you can rest your weary limbs and aching back. If the time should ever come when you can meet that thoughtful brother who made that seat and chiseled that invitation upon the top of yonder mountain, tell him how much his work was appreciated. Tell him that the bench of stone not only gave you physical rest but that his words reminded you of a duty.

Kindness Remembered

How much harder our lot would be if there were not some people considerate and kind to weary travelers on life's journey! Some people take the kindness gratefully, while others need the admonition, "Be thankful."

An American art-student in Paris tells of meeting his laundress at some distance from home with her bread basket upon her arm. She was going to the bakery to get her rolls and bread for the day. He asked her, "Why do you go so far for your bread every day? Does the baker where you go make better bread than any other baker in Paris?" "No," answered the woman, "he does not make better bread. The reason I cross the Seine every day to buy my bread at Monsieur's, is because, a few years ago, my husband was thrown out of work, and I was very sick. We had no money in the house, yet for weeks this baker trusted us, and kept us supplied with bread. Had it not been for his goodness my husband and children might have starved. As he cared for us when we had nothing, I must not forget his kindness now that we have much." To be thankful means to be "thoughtful." That means so to train our grateful memories that we will never forget the kindness of those who have helped us in the dark days of our past struggles.

> I have heard of hearts unkind, kind deeds
> With coldness still returning;
> Alas! the gratitude of men
> Hath oftener left me mourning.

The hero of my text is a "thankful" man; a "thoughtful" man; a man who would not if he could, and could not if he would, forget the priceless blessing which Jesus had conferred upon him. For years this man had been a social outcast. He was a repulsive, loathsome leper. His father and mother had turned against him. His brothers and sisters had fled from him as they would from a mad dog. His wife and children, if he had a wife and children, had deserted him. With sticks and stones he had been driven forth from the habitations of man. One day, with nine other lepers with whom he was associating, he stood upon the hillside, and saw Jesus and the multitudes passing by. By the strange law of the leper-world, which gathers information from every source, these ten lepers learned that it was Jesus, the miracle-worker. So these ten lepers begin to cry out at the top of their voices for divine help. Again and again they call, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us!" Christ turns toward them, as he always turns at the call for help, and practically says: "Yes, I will cure you of your horrible infectious disease. Go show yourselves unto the priests." "And it came to pass that, as they went, they were cleansed."

No sooner did this leper of my text feel the scales drop off his body and the blood of health course through his veins, than at once he cried, "I am well! I am well! I must go back at once and thank the Lord for what he has done for me." "And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back and with a loud voice glorified God, and fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks; and he was a Samaritan." We respect that man, and we have a poor opinion of those other nine who went on without giving thanks. But the incident has a lesson for us. We have received many blessings from God; are we like the cleansed Jewish lepers who went forward ungratefully, or like the Samaritan who "turned back and glorified God"?

The Blessing of Health

Like the cleansed leper of my text, let us thank God for our physical health. Let us thank God that we have food enough to eat. More than this, let us thank God for a good digestion with which to eat food. How many of us who have perfect health forget to thank God for a good pair of lungs and for steady nerves and for a regular heart, for good teeth, for good eyes and a good pair of legs upon which to walk! How many of us omit to thank God when we get up in the morning that the joints of our bodies do not squeak, on account of rheumatism, like an old rusty hinge which has not been moved for many years! When we go to bed at night, do we thank God that we can go there to sleep, and not have to toss hour after hour, until at last we cannot endure the suffering any more, and we have to arise and light the gas and go to reading, in order to distract our irritating thoughts? In other words, do we thank God that we have health and strength? Too often we neglect to do so until we have learned by pain and suffering the blessings we have lost. You who have suffered like the leper of my text, or like scores and hundreds of us who have passed through years of pain and weakness, know why I put the blessing of physical health in the forefront of this sermon.

The Leper's Discovery

Have you never by personal experience been able to picture the distress of this poor leper of my text before he was compelled to confess himself a hopeless leper? I have often. I have sometimes imagined him one of the stalwart men of the East. I have imagined him grow a healthy boy, a healthy young man, and then marry. He has a beautiful home, a dear wife and a couple of lovely children. All that is possible to make a young man's life happy is his. But one day, while taking a bath, he sees a little white spot just over his left shoulder. He does not think much of it at first. He tries to rub it away, but it will not rub off. Then in a week or two he sees that this small white spot is growing a little larger. A month later, he finds it still a little larger. He tries to massage it with a rough towel, but it will not rub out. Now he begins to have his suspicions. His face takes on a worried look. He does not tell any one, even his wife. Now he cannot sleep well at night. He becomes cross and irritable. One night, his wife misses him from her side. She gets up to find out where he is gone. She finds him in the next room bending over the sleeping children. He is weeping and wringing his hands, saying, "Oh, who will look after these children after I am gone?" "What is the matter, husband?" she says. "You are not going to leave the babies, are you? Is anything the matter?" He says, "Nothing; nothing," for he dare not tell her the truth.

Driven From Home

One day he faints dead away. When the servants undress him to put him to bed, they find out his true condition. He is a leper, a doomed leper. Then they drive him out from the home. They drive him out from the habitations of man. They drive him out to live and to die among the lepers. Thus you can see how grateful that leper ought to have been when Jesus brushed away the fatal scales of leprosy from off his breast and arms and neck and forehead. Do you wonder that that leper returned to thank God for his physical health?

Ought not scores and hundreds of us to thank God for our restored physical health? Some of us well remember the day when we never expected to be strong and well, as we are now. Perhaps your physical histo has been that of many. Perhaps we came up to twe twenty-five years of age and never knew what it have an ache or a pain. Then disease, like a ing paralysis, got hold of us. Then our health back to us almost as miraculously as did the re health of the ancient leper. We felt as one sna from the tomb. Like the leper of old, are you gr to God for that restored physical health? Reme there was a day when you would gladly have every dollar you owned to be physically well as yo to-day. Now, are you glorifying God, like the of old, for your restored physical health? Oh, t estimable blessings of a sound physical body! would dare to keep silent lips when God has blessed him with a sound physical frame?

The Leper Restored

But next to the blessing of physical health, for do you suppose that leper of old thanked Jesus? you suppose that cleansed leper kept kneeling at J feet, saying, "Master, Master, I can never thank enough! I will never leave thee! I will always by thy side if thou wilt only let me"? No, I do believe that leper did any such thing. I do no lieve he stayed with Christ very long. I think he to Christ to give him his thanks. Then he "Master, I want to run home and see my wife children and father and mother, and all my dear Oh, I want to tell them what you have done fo I want to take them in my arms and kiss them, ju I used to do before these fatal scales came upo breast." Then I think Jesus said, "Go, my son Go and tell your dear ones the glad news. I given them to you to love just as I have given your physical health." Now I see that cleansed running toward his old home. I hear him say goes, "Jesus has given me back my father and mo and brothers and sisters and wife and little chil Thank God for my restored home! Thank God!" As you thank God to-day for your physical health, are also thanking him for the sanctity and the purity the love of your domestic circle?

Do you thank him for your babies' cribs? Do thank him for your wife's tender, gentle compan ship? Do you thank God because your old moth is yet alive and that she is ever thinking and plan and praying for her boy, no matter where she is? you thank God because your dear ones' joys are joys, and because your sorrows of life are lessene their willingness to help you share them? Have ever thanked God for the of living and working for the treasured member of the home circle? Ah, yes, we appreciate our dear when God takes one of them away from us; why do not, and why can we not, appreciate our loved when they are by our side? If any of them sho have gone beyond we should think of death simply transition, a going from one group of loved ones another group of loved ones. Can you not thank for the wife, the mother, the father, the sister, brother, the child of the family circle? Can you like the leper of old, thank God for the purity and love of the domestic fireside?

But no sooner did this cleansed leper reach his ho and clasp his dear wife and children and loved one in his arms, than at once the news began to spread. flew like a white-winged messenger of joy from hou top to housetop. "Have you heard the news?" as one neighbor of another. "Why, our long-lost fri has been cleansed of his leprosy. Come, let us go and give our hand of love and join this happy fam circle. Oh, the good news! the good news! Co let us go up and tell how we have mourned for hi and how we glory in his wonderful cure." Then think the neighbors spoke to each other. Now I them hastening to the home. Some knock and oth rush right in. These neighbors squeeze his hand; th pat his cheek; they laugh and weep for joy. Can y

Lazarus, one is again reminded that Mohammedans are the controlling power, for the population of the village is entirely Moslem. There is some suggestion again of the modern world in the Inn of the Good Samaritan, because it is now a government post office.

Those who revere the sacred traditions would do well not to trust too much to what the guides or the dragomans tell them. A favorite explanation which these dragomans give of the "needle's eye" is that it comes from the Arabic word which means a small gate or passageway. They tell the credulous that in the olden times, while the main gates of the city would be closed, the smaller gate would be open, and that the Bedouins with their camels, arriving too late to penetrate the main entrance, could, if the camel was young and very small, squeeze it through the smaller passageway. Hence, according to the dragomans, the rich man might squeeze into the kingdom of heaven. One evening at the hotel, some tourists were explaining this fanciful interpretation. It impressed them.

Dr. Merrill, our consul, whose Biblical learning is recognized all over the world, sat at the table. I asked him what the Scriptural phrase really meant.

"Just what it says," he replied. "It is easier for a camel to pass through a needle's eye than for a rich man, who has misused his riches or gotten them unfairly, to enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Then he explained that the Arabic word which the dragomans quoted as meaning "needle's eye" was not part of the language in the Saviour's time, and he further showed how baseless their tale was. Thus does sound scholarship destroy the tales of ignorant guides and credulous tourists.

Laying the Corner-stone of the New German Sanatorium on the Mount of Olives

ON Sunday afternoon, March 31 last, a very interesting ceremony took place on the classic summit of the Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, when, in the name of the German Empress, Freiherr von Mirbach and Konsistorialrath Pfarer Lahusen laid the foundation-stone of a large sanatorium, which is to be erected on this historic site for the use of missionaries in the East, irrespective of denomination.

His Excellency Ah Akhren Bey, the Turkish Governor-General of Palestine, was present in full uniform and orders, as also were the Mayor of Jerusalem, Fadi Effendi; the Mutesarrif of Damascus, the Military Commandant of Jerusalem, and all the foreign consuls in the Holy City.

In spite of a cold and boisterous wind, many visitors assembled to witness the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone and reading the Kaiserin's deed of gift, which was afterward deposited in the heart of the stone.

Slowly but surely Germany is making her influence felt all over Asia Minor and Syria. W. G. F.

man, thank God for your many friends who are g under the shadow of your home to-day?

hen we were sick, did not our friends come in to e us and to bring the delicacies? When we lost a l, and the undertaker hung the crape streamer upon door, have not our loving, sympathizing friends e in to stand by our side at the casket? When we e in financial trouble, if we were honest and true, e they not always been willing to come to our as- nce? Have they not always been true to us in s of sorrow as well as in times of joy? I once read n old Danish captain who gave battle to an English ate. After the battle had been raging for some e, a flag of truce was raised, and the old captain in wboat pulled over to the English frigate and made strange request. He said: "My powder has run . Will you please furnish me some of your powder, we will continue to fight?" Well, no one ever rd of a man going to an enemy for help, but we e heard of his going to his friends. Ah, yes, our nds in the past have helped us again and again and in! Thank God for your friends! Thank God for le, true-hearted, brave, self-sacrificing friends!

Again, this cleansed leper must have been thankful t the doors of the temple were once more opened to e him a welcome to the altar of God. In olden es, leprosy was looked upon as the symbol of heinous Thus the poor leper not only felt that he was barred n fellowship with man, but also from communion h God. Methinks I can see these lepers some Sab- h day gathering upon one of the hillsides near to usalem. The service is going on within the sacred ls. The music, which cannot be circumscribed by r walls, drifts through the portal, and, like a bird, rs over the hills. The poor lepers are listening to sweet psalms. As the choir sings, they think of the e when they used to gather in the temple with the rshipers. And methinks I see the tears rain down ir parched cheeks, as they weep and cry: "O Lord, y hast thou shut me out from thy love? Why am I barred from thy holy worship? Wilt thou never again speak to me in tones of pity and pardon? Wilt thou never forgive me my past sins?" Then when Jesus cured the poor sick man of his leprosy, he seemed to say: "Son, thy sins are forgiven thee! Thou art welcome now to join in public worship. Thou mayest now go into the temple and sing God's praises. Though thy sins are as scarlet, yet they shall become white as snow." Thus I hear the poor leper cry: "Lord, I thank thee that when thou hast cleansed me of my leprosy, thou hast forgiven me my sins. I thank thee, Lord! I thank thee!" To-day can you not glorify God like the poor leper, because Christ by his atoning blood has made it possible for you to be cleansed of all your past iniquities, so that in the sight of God you can be pure through his word?

Oh, the power of the blood of Jesus to blot out sin! Who has tongue eloquent enough fully to describe it? There is a beautiful story told that many years ago a woman came to her pastor bemoaning her sins. "They are a heavy burden," she said. "They are like a load of wet sand." The minister heard and agreed. "Have you ever been on that strip of sand by the beacon?" he asked. "Oh yes, many times," she said. "Go there now," said he, "and dig. Pile the wet sand up into a great mound. Pile it as high as you can and then see what becomes of it." "Ah," exclaimed the penitent woman, "I know what you mean. The flowing tide will come and wash it all away." "Yes," said the minister, "so the blood of Jesus Christ can wash away all your sins, though they may be as infinite in number as the sands of the sea." Like the poor burdened woman, and like the leper who was cleansed of his fatal scales, should not you thank God that by the death of his only begotten Son it is possible for you to be cleansed of all sin?

We wonder what the later life of that leper was. Did his gratitude exhaust itself in that loud voice with which he glorified God? We cannot think so. Day by day as he went around in health and strength, he would remember who it was that gave him his new life and would strive to live in accordance with Christ's teaching. Is not that our duty? Shall we praise him for delivering us from sin and then go away and forget our obligations? The life that Christ has given us, like that he gave the leper, should be a life devoted to him, consecrated to him and to his service. He has told us how we may show our gratitude. He died "that they who live should henceforth live not unto themselves but unto him who died for them."

Christianity Spreading in Japan

IT will interest readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to learn that their gifts to the famine sufferers in Japan have resulted in something more than the relief of the temporal wants of the large number of sufferers. In a recent letter from one of the missionaries in that field, he writes: "In the Northeast, the famine work has shown in a most tangible way the magnificent spirit of charity which our religion fosters. In Sendai the four Christian schools and the large number of missionaries and Japanese Christians have so transfused the spirit of Christ through the social fabric that a revival is a natural consequence. Special evangelistic meetings are being held throughout the city with remarkable results. On November 25 the writer had the rare honor of baptizing forty-two persons in one class. Among these there were officials, bankers, business men, university, college and middle school students. There are still many earnest inquirers who are being instructed in the Bible. From present appearances it would seem that this movement was likely to become general."

Rev. W. E. Lampe, who was the chairman of the Relief Committee, reports that seventy-two persons at Iwanuma have decided to become Christians. Twenty-three were baptized on December 23, and in one church alone there were one hundred inquirers.

Addresses upon Christianity have hitherto been unpopular among the educated classes in many places. Now, they are attended by eager thousands in every part of the country. (REV.) H. LOOMIS, Agent A.B.S.

What it Means to Save a Child

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAF

LET me introduce you to a Hebrew family in Egypt: Amram, the father; Jochebed, the mother; a daughter, Miriam, about eleven years old; a son, Aaron, three years old, and a new baby boy less than three months old. Jochebed uses all a mother's loving tact to keep her little baby quiet, lest his cries shall discover him to those who would take his life. The child grows stronger, cries louder, can no longer be concealed. The mother determines that he must be put in the river, according to the king's decree that all Hebrew boy babies shall be thrown into the Nile, but she makes a plan to save the life of her baby boy, even while conforming to the king's edict.

Coffin of the Princess Nefer-ari

She weaves a little basket out of bulrushes, and makes it watertight by covering it inside and out with pitch, and into this, with loving prayer, she puts the child, wrapped in his swaddling-clothes. She takes the precious burden to the banks of the Nile, and places it on the river's brink among the lilies. She does not dare to remain to see what shall be the fate of her child, but she tells her daughter Miriam to hover near and, while seeming to play, to watch her little brother. The king's daughter comes down to the river to bathe in the early morning. The maidens who accompany her discover the little one in the rush basket, and tell the princess. She bids them bring it to her, and when they do so, she removes the cover, and a beautiful weeping child is discovered. Its cries and tears appeal to her womanly heart. She recognizes the tragedy, and says, "It is one of the Hebrew's children." She names it Moses, which means "drawn out of the water." Miriam, apparently with curiosity natural to a child, comes to the side of the princess to look at the baby. She sees that the princess is minded to adopt the child as her own, and hears her express a wish that she might obtain a nurse for it. Miriam offers to find a nurse, and being told to do so, brings her mother to the princess, keeping it a secret, of course, that she is the mother. "Take it and nurse it for me, and I will pay thee thy wages," says the princess to Jochebed. She takes the child home again; no longer any need to hush its cries, for it is now under royal protection.

Moses in the Palace

Jochebed can thus have the baby for three years. At that age he is brought to the royal palace to live, by order of the princess, who has now become the queen. The boy Moses is given a fine education. He is taught all the learning of the Egyptians. In one of the great temples white-robed priests teach him to read the hieroglyphic libraries of stone, and to write himself; they teach him also grammar, and mathematics, and astronomy, and medicine, and religion. But he possesses the Hebrew spirit, and so is aroused by the indignities heaped upon his people. One day he slays an Egyptian taskmaster in the act of beating a Hebrew. He hides the body of the Egyptian in the sand. Shortly after, he leaves the royal household, choosing to be counted among his own people rather than to enjoy the pleasures of the palace. He departs from Egypt, and fixes upon Midian as his dwelling place, and assumes the duties of a shepherd.

His first characteristic act is to protect the shepherdesses against the Midianite shepherds, who try to prevent them from getting water for their flocks.

Illustration and Application

Let us consider (1) the outcast child, (2) the faithful mother, (3) the wise sister, (4) the king's daughter, who together unconsciously formed a children's aid society, which, in saving a foundling, did the world an immeasurable service, for the child proved to be the greatest of human kind. Look on this picture of a rescued child, then on the picture of Moses in after years as the lawgiver and leader of his people, and learn what it means to save a child. It will help us to remember his birth, to link 1571 B.C., when he was born, with 1517 A.D., when Luther, another great leader, nailed the theses of the great Reformation on the church door.

How familiar the lowly beginning of our hero! "A child of poor but honest parents" is the introduction to the world's greatest biographies.

Don't snub a boy because he wears shabby clothes. When Edison, the inventor of the phonograph, first entered Boston, he wore a pair of yellow linen trousers in the depth of winter. Don't snub a boy because his house is plain and unpretending. Abraham Lincoln's early home was a log cabin. Don't snub a boy because of the ignorance of his parents. Shakespeare, the world's poet, was a son of a man who was unable to write his own name. Don't snub a boy because he chooses a humble trade. The author of Pilgrim's Progress was a tinker. Don't snub a boy because of physical disability. Milton was blind. Don't snub a boy because of dulness in his lessons. Hogarth, the celebrated painter and engraver, was a stupid boy at his books. Don't snub a boy because he stutters. Demosthenes, the greatest orator of Greece, overcame a harsh and stammering voice. Don't snub any one. Not only because some day he may far outstrip you in the race of life, but because it is neither kind, nor right, nor Christian.

Struggles of Genius

Make your opportunity, as Lincoln made his in the log cabin in the wilderness. Make it, as Henry Wilson made his during his evenings on a farm, when he read a thousand volumes, while other boys of the neighborhood wasted their evenings. Make it, as the shepherd boy Ferguson made his when he calculated the motions of the stars with a handful of beads on a string. Make it, as George Stephenson made his when he mastered the rules of mathematics with a bit of chalk on the sides of the coal wagons in the mines. Make it, as D made his when he learned to read from scraps of and posters.

Thirty years ago a barefooted, ragged urchin pre himself before the desk of the principal partne manufacturing firm in Glasgow and asked for work errand boy. "There's a deal o' running to be d said Mr. Blank. "Your qualification wud be a pair o' shoon." The boy, with a grave nod, disappeared. He lived by doing odd jobs in the market, and slept under one of the stalls. Two months passed before he had saved enough money to buy the shoes. Then he presented himself before Mr. Blank one morning, and held out a package. "I have the shoon, sir," he said quietly. "Oh!" Mr. Blank with difficulty recalled the circumstances. "You want a place? Not in those rags, my lad. You would disgrace this house." The boy hesitated a moment, and then went out without a word. Six months p before he returned, decently clothed in coarse but garments. Mr. Blank's interest was aroused. Fo first time he looked at the boy attentively. His bloodless face showed that he had stinted himse food for months in order to buy those clothes.

The manufacturer now questioned the boy caref and found, to his regret, that he could neither rea write. A Faithful Mother

"God made mothers before he m ministers," says Dr. Theodore L. C ler, and he declares ministers h small chance of saving children wh parents are not leading them to G Statistics show that the father is influential as the mother. It was fo upon investigation that in fami where only the mother was a Christi one-third of the children were p fessing Christians, while there w two-thirds where both parents w Christians.

Don't forget to tell your faith mother you appreciate all her lovi care for you. A mother writes:

World's Sunday School Convention

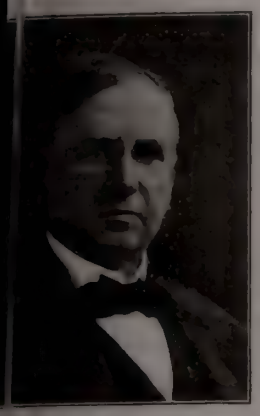
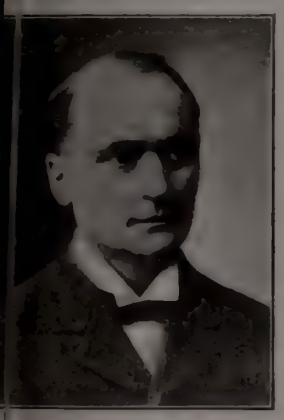
[illegible] train and steamship many hundreds of dele- gates are journeying toward the "Eternal City," to participate in a memorable and historic event—the fifth World's Sunday School [illegible]ntion. It assembles May 18, and continues for five days, until the 23d. It will doubtless be the most significant Protestant gathering ever held in the stronghold of Romanism. It will be unsectarian and undenominational in every respect.



Hon. John Wanamaker
[illegible]ice-president of Convention

This great assemblage of Sunday School leaders from all parts of the earth is expected to mark a new era in Sunday School progress. It is significant that the theme chosen for the Convention should be "The Sunday School and the Great Commission." The mis[illegible]ry spirit will be strongly in evidence throughout the entire gathering. Mr. E. K. Warren, of [illegible]igan, the president of the Convention, has for [illegible]s been in correspondence with missionaries in many lands arranging for their presence at the conference. The motto of the gathering is this pregnant declaration: "It is the whole business of the Church, and it is the business of the whole Church, to give the whole Gospel to the whole world as speedily as possible."



E. K. Warren
President of Convention

It will be remembered that the last World's Sunday School Convention was held in Jerusalem in 1904; previous ones having been held in London in 1898; in St. Louis in 1893; and in London in 1889. The [illegible]sent gathering will represent 262,000 Sunday Schools, [illegible]h 26,000,000 members. There will be considerably [illegible]r one thousand delegates, from both Christian and heathen lands, and from the distant islands of the sea, as well as from the great continents. White, black and yellow races will mingle and unite as one in the bonds of Christian fellowship.

In charge of the Convention are a number of the foremost Christian leaders of Europe and America. Among the vice-presidents are Prince Bernadotte of Sweden, Count Bernstorff of Germany, the Venerable Archdeacon of London, and Hon. John Wanamaker of Philadelphia. The chairman of the Executive Committee is Dr. George W. Bailey of Philadelphia, who has had many years of experience in Sunday School affairs, having long been treasurer of the International Committee. Another member of the Executive Committee is Mr. William N. Hartshorn, of Boston, who is also chairman of the Transportation Committee. Mr. Hartshorn is chairman of the International Committee as well, and, like Dr. Bailey, he has worked with untiring energy for the welfare of the Sunday School world. Another prominent member of the Executive Committee is Mr. H. J. Heinz, the well-known manufacturer of Pittsburg.

America's delegates are journeying to Rome in two specially chartered steamships. Both left these shores on the same day and will arrive in Rome about May 14, a few days before the Convention proper begins. One ship, the Romanic, of the White Star Line, sailed from Boston, and the other, the Neckar, of the North German Lloyd Line, sailed from New York. Both ships were filled with delegates several days before the date set for sailing.

This interesting general forecast of the Convention, including the names of some of the chief speakers at the gathering, has been prepared by Dr. Bailey:

"Sunday School missionary meetings will be held at Funchal, Gibraltar, Algiers, and possibly Genoa by the delegates sailing on the Romanic. Delegates sailing on the Neckar will hold a Missionary Conference at the Azores, and an afternoon and evening meeting at Naples. Our friends in England are planning to bring a goodly number of delegates; the Scottish Sunday School Union and other centres of Sunday School interest are also arranging tours. All indications are that the enrolment of the Convention will be large."

"The theme of the Convention," Dr. Bailey added, "will be 'The Sunday School and the Great Commission.' The Rev. Carey Bonner, secretary of the Sunday School Union, London, will have charge of the music. On Saturday, May 18, at 3 P.M. there will be a meeting of the World's Executive Committee for prayer and conference with the Italian National Committee and the Local Committee. At 8 P.M. there will be a welcome meeting with greetings from various delegates. Sunday, May 19, will be 'World's Sunday School Day.' The programme includes regular services at the various evangelical churches in Rome, Convention sermon by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, and an evening praise festival.

"We have the promise that there will be present from Great Britain the Hon. F. F. Belsey, J.P., Mr. Charles Waters, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, the Rev. G. Carey Bonner, the Rev. F.W. MacDonald, M.A., the Rev. Campbell Morgan, D.D., and Mr. A. C. Munroe; and we are encouraged to expect the presence of Lord Kinnaird, Prince Bernadotte, and Count Bernstorff. From North America, besides those already mentioned, there will come Mr. Marion Lawrence, Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner, Mr. W. C. Pierce, Mr. Fred A. Wells and Bishop Joseph C. Hartzell. Bishop Wm. Burt, of Switzerland, will also be there, together with representatives from all missionary centres."

William N. Hartshorn
Chairman Transportation Committee

The "World's Sunday School Day" gives promise of being notable in the annals of the Sunday School. It will be observed by every Sunday School in Mexico, and by great numbers throughout the United States and Canada.

Christians everywhere are invited to unite with the delegates in Rome in spending half an hour in the early morning of "World's Sunday School Day" in private prayer for God's blessing upon the Convention, and upon the work of Sunday Schools throughout the world. I am sure that thousands of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will gladly respond to this request.

Dr. George W. Bailey
Chairman Executive Committee

At the close of the Convention I am planning to send another article giving a general survey of the results of the historic gathering.

[illegible]OTHERS' circles in every section of the country are celebrating this year the tenth anniversary of the National Congress of Mothers. With [illegible] annual convention at Los Angeles, May 10 to 17, [illegible] Congress inaugurates its second decade.

With its tenth anniversary, the National Congress of Mothers is reaching out for a wider extension of its work in all parts of the country. Organizations now exist in twenty-nine States and in Japan. The work against polygamous practices will be kept up. At the tenth anniversary convention in Los Angeles, the Rev. W. H. Paden of Salt Lake City will discuss the Mormon menace. The Rev. Dr. Frank DeWitt Talmage, Rev. Robert J. Burdette, Judge Ben B. Lindsey, and Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, are among the leading speakers. The subjects to be discussed cover The Relation of Child Study to Home, School and State; Normal Training in Public Schools; Children of the Inter-Mountain States; Juvenile Court and Probation Work; Runaways and Truants; and The Ethics of International Courtesy. There will be special conferences on Punishments, Good Citizenship, The Adolescent Boy and Girl, and The Parent's Duty to Children in Forming Sacred Ideals for Marriage. With the opening of the Mothers' and Children's Building at the Jamestown Exposition, the National Congress of Mothers is finding a fertile opportunity for wider expansion.

$50,000 More for Chinese Relief

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
WASHINGTON, D.C., April 30, 1907.

DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH,
Editor and Proprietor Christian Herald, New York City.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: It is with great pleasure that I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th instant, enclosing two checks for $25,000 each for the relief of the starving people of China, and, agreeably to your request, the American Consul-General has this day been instructed by telegraph to pay to the Civic Committee of Shanghai $25,000, and to the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang $25,000, and draw on the Secretary of State for the amount, thus making the full $50,000 available in China to-day.

Very cordially yours,
ROBERT BACON,
Acting Secretary.

This latest remittance was cabled on the same day upon which the BUFORD sailed. On May 3 the following cablegram was received from Shanghai:

"Practically all Christian Herald's remittance already converted into foodstuffs and despatched into famine area. China's indebtedness American generosity everywhere acknowledged."

To Close the China Famine Fund

WITH the sailing of the flour-laden relief ship Buford, to be followed almost immediately by the second transport Logan, with a similar cargo, both contributed by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and their friends, the famine situation in China undergoes a substantial improvement. The $50,000 cabled by our Relief Fund on the Buford's sailing day will supply the urgent needs of the missionary workers until the food ships reach Chinkiang. When that happy event takes place, it will go very far toward giving the workers control of the situation.

On the whole, therefore, we feel justified in announcing to our readers and to the wide circle of generous-hearted friends throughout the country, who have so liberally assisted in this great life-saving campaign, that the conclusion of all their loving labors is now clearly in sight. Right nobly have they maintained the record of Christian America for practical Christlike service rendered to suffering humanity. In the most literal sense, their field has been the whole world, for they have reached out, with hands full of help and hearts overflowing with love and sympathy, to the farthest ends of the earth—to Armenia, Cuba, India, Russia, Finland, Japan and Korea abroad, and to the destitute in our own Southern and Western States, to the dwellers in the flood-swept Mississippi Valley, and to the multitudes of unemployed in our great cities as well. Elementary Christianity, some may call it; but it is a work that has brought with it much blessing to both soul and body. In the hearts of the rescued multitudes of China, there is to-day, the missionaries assure us, but one universal feeling: that of love and gratitude for the charity which has saved upwards of a hundred thousand lives, raising them from despair and from the very gates of death. They will have a new reverence for the teachings of that religion which finds expression in acts of such kindness as China, till now, has never known.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its proprietor and editors, are thankful to have been once more the channel of a noble international benevolence, which has been so signally blessed in its results.

On and after May 31, no more contributions will be received for the China Famine Fund. Any that may reach us after that date will be returned to the senders.

Preaching Under Canvas

THERE was sound reason for the appeal Gipsy Smith addressed to that meeting in New York the other day, for aid in evangelistic work. It is a great thing in these times of enormous immigration to have the Gospel preached through the summer months to the immigrants in their own tongue. They have not come to this country to get religion, but to earn a fortune, or at least an honest living. They are pretty sure to take no vacation, and if the tents are open, with the promise of a service in their own language, they will attend as they did in former years. Who can tell how much good may be done, even from a social standpoint, if some Italian or Russian immigrant, or some stranger of another nationality, is changed from a fierce anarchist, or from practical heathenism, to be a gentle follower of Christ? Our own people, too, many of whom stay away from the churches, and regard religion as the luxury of the rich, will be benefited, when they hear in the tents, where the utmost democratic equality is maintained, how great are the blessings Christianity holds out to the poor. They might hear the same fact all the year round in the churches, but they do not care to enter the fine buildings in which the contrast between their clothes and those of the regular worshipers is conspicuous. It is a good work to plant these tents about the city and preach the Gospel in them, and Gipsy Smith was right in appealing for funds for the purpose.

The sum needed is modest. Some tents must be purchased. In some instances rent must be paid for the land on which they are set up. Organs must be hired and though many volunteer singers give their services freely, there are others who must be paid for regular attendance during the summer. The people who will go away from the heated pavements and the foul-smelling gutters to the pure air of mountain or seashore may show their sympathy with those who remain behind by helping in this work. It rests with them to say to what extent the boast shall be fulfilled: "To the poor the Gospel is preached."

Spring in the Churches

HOW interesting it is, at this season of the year, in this climate, to watch the change taking place in the fields and gardens and parks! Nature is clothing the world in its new dress of lovely verdure and calling on the denuded trees to put forth their buds and blossoms. How good God is to renew this beautiful life! The very thought of perpetual winter makes us shudder. Winter is beneficial and physiologists tell us that without it we should be subject to many deadly maladies and our constitutions would become feeble and inert; but how gladly we welcome the spring? The spirit sympathizes with the resurrection going on all around, and responds to the call to the joyful awakening. Is there not in the call a summons to a more genial, hopeful cheerfulness than has been felt hitherto? Can we not rise out of the gloom and sordid materialism of our past lives, into the clearer warmer atmosphere of the better life?

It is good to notice how the leaders of modern religious thought are presenting this conception of spiritual life in their sermons and books. The awe and gloomy solemnity with which the facts and doctrines of the Gospel were presented a century ago have almost disappeared and men are invited to rejoice in the love and kindness of a beneficent Father. The old doctrines have not been abandoned, but they are being held in a new way and are being viewed from a new standpoint. God is no longer pictured to the world as a stern, relentless being, holding the sinner over the pit of fire and watching his writhings. He is no longer portrayed as delighting in sacrifice and craving the blood of the slaughtered offering. It is as a yearning Father, grieving over the perversity of his children and beckoning to them to leave their suicidal ways and come to him for peace and happiness. This note in the pulpit and in the press is very welcome, and it is strange that it has been kept so long in the background, for Isaiah and Ezekiel preached it, and Christ emphasized it by sermon and parable.

The new view does not hold out the idea of relaxation of the old requirements. The sinner does not find the entrance to the kingdom made wider and easier than of old. As Christ showed the people of his time, his requirements went deeper than those of the law, and while the law had formerly been satisfied with avoiding overt transgression, he required eradication of sinful desires and thoughts; so the new presentation of the Gospel goes deeper than the old. It is not satisfied with an acceptance of doctrines, with belief in schemes of salvation. It emphasizes the necessity of the change in nature which Christ described to Nicodemus. The man who is admitted to the kingdom is not a man with a new creed, but a man with a new nature; one who loves God and proves it by loving his brother also. That is indeed a change in our world, so long ruled by selfishness and greed. of that kind, men so changed, may redeem the wo love and kindness, being like the great Father in h So, if the number of such men increases, the e which the poet longed may come, when "every shall change to spring."

Pharaoh Under the Lamp

MODERN discoveries and inventions were never in more startling contrast with antiquity than they are in the tombs of the ancient kings of Egypt. Paget, who recently visited the excavations for the lon Sphere, sends to that periodical a picture of a he witnessed at Luxor, some four hundred miles Cairo, Egypt, which shows this contrast impress- . iners Imprisoned

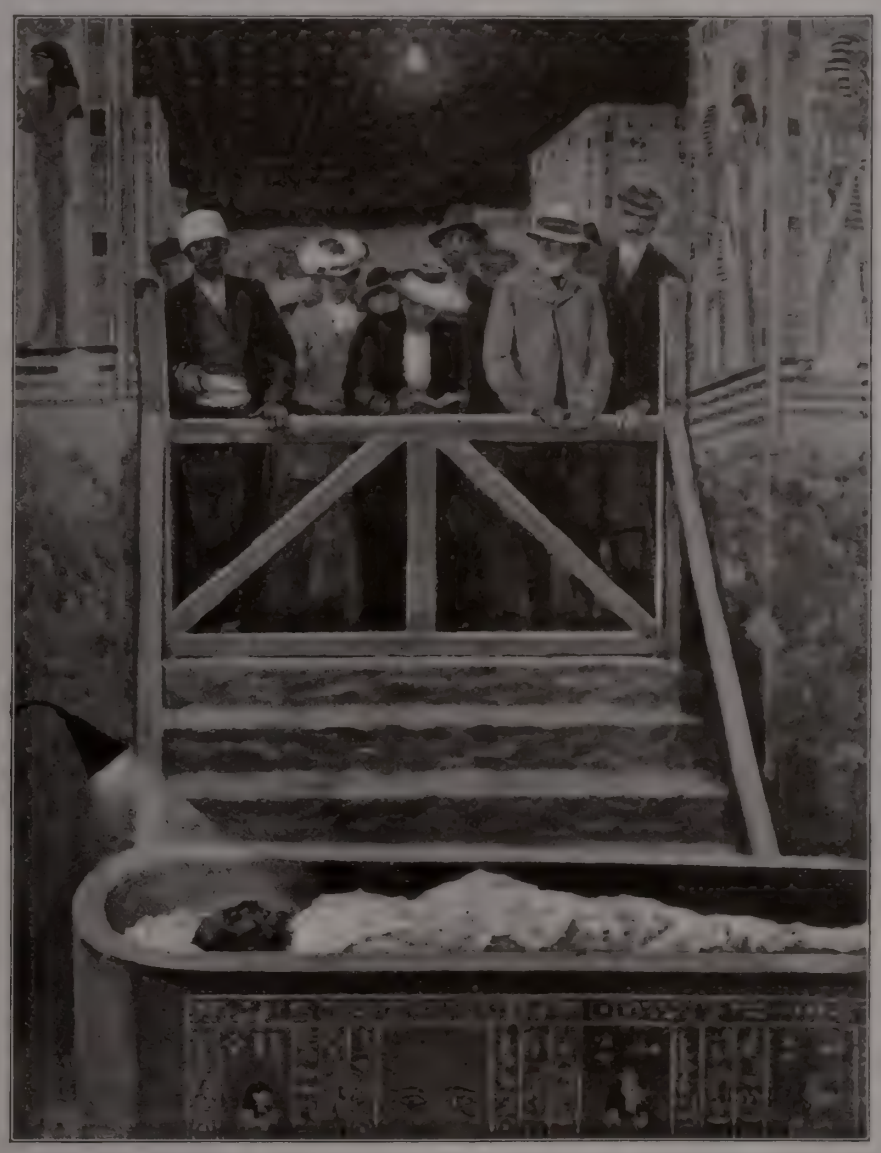
In a mine at Foustwell, near Johns- wn, Pa., seven men were at work on ril 26, when a blast broke the wall an abandoned working. Instantly ter rushed in with such force and lume as to shut them off from com- unication with the surface. It was pposed for several hours that they ere all dead by drowning or suffoca- n, but some of the miners believed ey could hear rapping in the flooded ction. The possibility of saving the prisoned men stirred every man's ood. Twelve large pumps were put operation and kept going day and ght. Whenever there was a minute's ence, the tapping could be heard, oving that the men were still alive. ur days and nights passed and thou- nds gathered at the mouth of the ine eager to take any risk to rescue e imperiled men. But the water was ll deep and only a few inches from e black roof of the passage. On the th day it was found that there was a ace of six inches between the water d the roof, and then a call was made for volunteers to ade through. Four men offered themselves. The ader was a brother of one of the prisoners. He had ready made three ineffectual attempts to get through. e rescuers proceeded cautiously, holding one another's nds to prevent separation. They carried food and mulants to strengthen the prisoners, who they foresaw ust be weak with fasting. Happily they found all of em alive. They could not, of course, be brought rough the water in their weak condition. It had tried en their rescuers to struggle through, but the provi- ons were passed to them, and being so revived they were le to remain till the water was low enough to wade rough. The papers say such joy has seldom been en in that section as was witnessed when they were ought up safely. The people experienced something of the joy that even angels feel when lost sinners are brought to repentance.

There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. (Luke 15 : 10.)

Native, but a Stranger

On the deck of a vessel which entered New York from Italy last week was an aged man who protested against being sent to Ellis Island as an immigrant. He declared that he was a native American, but he did so in Italian, and could not understand the questions put to him in English. An Italian examiner was brought, to whom the traveler told his story. He said his father had been a native of Boston, Mass. His mother came from Italy, and had been about five years in this country when the New Englander fell in love with her and married her. They went to Ohio, then a desolate region, to live and there he was born. He was named Giuseppe, which his mother said was the name of her father. For a time the frontier farm prospered, but when the little Giuseppe was only seven years old, his father sickened and died. The widow struggled along three years longer, and then went home to her family and soon fell ill and died. The little American was put to work in his uncle's vineyard as soon as he was old enough. There he grew up to manhood, making a fair living but not saving much money. Later, there were family cares, and though he always intended to return to the land of his birth, some event always occurred to prevent him. He used to boast of being an American, but he forgot his native language, and living among Italians became Italian in all but nativity. Not until this year, when he was seventy years old, was he able to fulfil his desire to see again the land of his birth that he left sixty years ago. It was no wonder that the Immigration Commissioners doubted his citizenship. A man who had been absent sixty years and could not speak the language was naturally suspected. His papers, however, were found to be regular, and they confirmed his strange story. He had the right to enter the country, not as an immigrant, but as a native. He was accordingly admitted, and was thus in better case than those men will be who plead at the last to enter Christ's kingdom, though they are ignorant of its laws and principles, and having spent their lives with worldlings, have forgotten even the language of its people.

He shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence ye are : depart from me. (Luke 13 : 27.)



The Body of an Ancient Pharaoh Under the Electric Light

Material for Idols

A new export enterprise is reported from Missouri. A Kansas City newspaper states that a use has at last been found for "tiff," one of the by-products of the lead and zinc mining districts. The Emperor of Japan is developing some coal mines in the neighborhood of Ping Yang, Korea, and he has had as manager of the works an enterprising man who is observant of the habits of the Koreans. He noticed that the native likes to carry his idol, or a model of his idol, around with him to insure good luck, and therefore it needs to be made of some durable material, which should also be brilliant or glittering. Some of the gods he examined appeared to him to be made of very inferior material. He believed that a good trade might be done with the Koreans by offering them images made of a better material, of a cheap character. He talked with a missionary in Ping Yang about his desire to find such a metal and she told him that there was plenty of "tiff" near her old home in Kansas City. He came here and made an investigation, which confirmed the missionary's statement. He has accordingly shipped a cargo of the stuff to Ping Yang, where he proposes to establish an idol-factory in which he can produce more durable gods than do the native idol-makers. So when the factory is in operation, the native may show his respect for American civilization in either way. He may worship the idol made of American metal, or he may heed the American missionaries' counsel to abjure all idols. Thus the desire for gain neutralized Christian work and the Scripture challenge is answered:

Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter? (James 3: 11.)

America's Seniority

A remark made by our English visitor, Mr. W. T. Stead, that he regarded the United States as "a new and juvenile nation," leads the New York Times to call his attention to some facts not generally realized even by Americans. "Since the signing of the Declaration of Independence," it reminds him, "France has been successively a republic, an empire, a kingdom, a constitutional monarchy, a republic, an empire, a commune, and has again become a republic. The Hapsburgs no longer rule the Holy Roman Empire, because it has ceased to exist, and are content to be Emperors of Austria, Kings of Hungary, etc. The German Empire is but a thing of yesterday; the Kingdom of Italy is hardly out of its swaddling-clothes; the Kingdom of Sweden has passed from the Vasas to the Bernadottes; the Kingdom of Norway has just reached the kindergarten age. Roumelia, Bulgaria and Servia have been born as States; the last vestige of royalty has passed away from Mexico and South America; the power of Japan has passed from the Shogun to the Mikado." The influence of the United States in the family of nations is universally conceded, and this statement shows she can also claim the title of an elder sister. We may hope that it will also long have that higher honor which alone can entitle it to reverence:

Righteousness exalteth a nation. (Prov. 14: 34.)

God Speed the Gallant "Buford"

Scenes of Enthusiasm at the Farewell Meeting when she Sailed—Another $50,000 Cabled the Same Day by "The Christian Herald"

ON the forenoon of April 30, a large and representative gathering assembled in San Francisco to give farewell and Godspeed to the army transport Buford, about to sail for China with a cargo of 28,000 barrels of flour, the gift of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and their friends to the famine-stricken Chinese. The services were held on the Folsom Street dock, at 10 o'clock A.M., and were impressive and enthusiastic throughout, showing the strong hold this great international charity has obtained upon the hearts and sympathies of the public.

On the platform were many persons of prominence, including Hon. James Gillett, Governor of California; Bishop William Ford Nichols, of the Episcopal Church; Hon. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, president University of California; Hon. James D. Phelan, ex-mayor of San Francisco; Gen. J. B. Rawles, local representative of the Red Cross; Rev. John Hemphill, of Calvary Presbyterian Church, San Francisco; Rev. E. E. Baker; Mr. E. E. Edson, head of the local Y. M. C. A.; Rev. E. I. Willis; Ng Poon Chew, editor of the Chinese newspaper in San Francisco; a number of local members of the Red Cross, and a large attendance from the various churches, church societies and similar organizations, besides hundreds of citizens generally. The regimental band of the Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., furnished the music for the occasion.

Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D., presided. With him on the platform was Mrs. Talmage, both having come from Los Angeles to witness the sailing of the relief ship. Mr. E. R. Johnstone, who accompanies the vessel to China, was also present, as the special representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Chu and his Sons, who Aided Relief Work

After the band had rendered "Jerusalem," and the opening hymn, "Jesus Shall Reign," had been sung, responsive reading, led by Rev. Dr. Hemphill, followed. Another hymn, "We Give Thee But Thine Own," was sung by the audience with spirit, and was followed by prayer by Rev. Dr. Baker.

Dr. Talmage, as chairman, then made a brief address, in the course of which he referred to America's influence in maintaining the peace of the world, as illustrated in the policy our government pursued in preventing the spoliation and partition of China by Europe after the Boxer uprising and in our successful efforts for bringing about peace between Russia and Japan, which resulted in the treaty of Portsmouth. "This government," he said, "is started on a world-wide conquest by the pen of the diplomat and by its evangelists of justice and of peace. . . . But though there have been many men driving us ahead in solving the problems of international difficulties, I believe one of the most potent individual factors that have come to our land is an editor of a great religious paper in New York. That man's name is Louis Klopsch, and that paper's name is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. That paper has been the means of raising millions of dollars for the starving of many lands, and the shiploads of flour which this man and the readers of this paper have sent to foreign lands have saved multitudes of lives.

"The first of these ships sent forth from this land was the Leo, sent to relieve the awful famine of Russia in 1892. That relief ship, Leo, according to the authorities at Washington, did more to bind Russia to America and America to Russia than any other single means for the last fifty years. Next went forth from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the City of Everett, filled with flour, to Calcutta in 1897. Next the good ship Quito also went to relieve that same Indian famine. These two ships were chartered by our National Government, especially for these great charities, which resulted in the saving of hundreds of thousands of lives. And to-day the people of India are blessing our name for this humanitarian service.

"Now we are assembled to wish Godspeed to the good ship Buford, going to famine-stricken China. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already raised over $400,000 to alleviate this famine. President Roosevelt and Secretary Elihu Root each contributed $100 for this fund.

"May God bless the Buford in her mission of mercy. Standing here to-day in the presence of the Governor of this commonwealth, and the president of our largest university, and the bishop of our largest Episcopalian diocese, and the representatives of the Catholic and the Protestant churches, all of whom have contributed to this fund, we are here to ask a divine blessing upon the Buford, this new messenger of peace of America's international policies. May God bless the President of the United States and his great Secretary, and all who have contributed to this noble service of saving the physical lives of the dying men and women and children of poor suffering, starving China."

At the conclusion of Dr. Talmage's remarks, Mr. E. R. Johnstone, on behalf of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, thanked the audience for its interest and sympathy in the relief work. He read the following communication, which he had just received from Dr. Klopsch:

"Please heartily thank the good people of this Christian land of ours and our sympathetic government for all the loving kindness, cordial co-operation and generous sympathy they have shown toward the starving people of China, now in the grasp of the greatest famine of modern times. It is a great privilege to do this humanitarian work, as every one who has had a share in it must realize. I esteem it as one of the highest of all privileges. This cargo of life-giving food goes across the seas, accompanied by the prayers of all good people that it may become the means, under divine blessing, of halting the famine in great measure. May every one of the five million pounds of flour on the Buford save a precious life! And while we, in the spirit of brotherly kindness, send this bread to the perishing, may a higher Power give the double blessing to China and accompany this gift with that Bread of Life of which if a man eat he shall never hunger more—the Bread that giveth life eternal.

"I send my earnest prayers and best wishes for the Buford, her officers and crew (God bless them one and all!), and for a speedy and prosperous conclusion of the mission of mercy.

"You will rejoice, as will all the good people who surround you on this felicitous occasion, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD feels encouraged, through the additional liberal response of generous-hearted people, to increase the guaranty of $25,000, in addition to what it has already contributed, to $50,000, thus raising the grand total of its contributions in cash and flour to $400,000, with the prospect of another $100,000 yet to come. Godspeed to the Buford and all on board, including your own good self."

U. S. Transport "Buford," Which Carries a Food Cargo to Starving China

President Wheeler, of the University of California, was the next speaker. He spoke of the teachings of Christ that no man should receive until he had given of that which he has, and that only he who serves shall rule. Bishop Nichols, during his brief address, said: "The great waterways of the world have now become the highways of the brotherhood of man. Those of us who stood in the bread line in San Francisco, after the disaster of last April, can appreciate the value of the help now being sent. It is right that we should send on the help to suffering ones across the ocean. Race contact has its value. The good man who goes across the ocean line brings out the good man on the other side, and in this way great questions may be solved, if he does not go across in the spirit of greed or for conquest."

Governor Gillett also spoke briefly. He believed that the Christian spirit of which the Buford's cargo is the evidence, "is due to the fact that we belong to a Christian land. Without this spirit, we could not stand up before the world. With it, not only can we sell but we can live in every market of the world."

Ex-Mayor Phelan, on behalf of the Red Cross, spoke with gratitude of the great assistance rendered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers to the life-saving campaign in famine-stricken China.

"My Country, 'Tis of Thee" was then sung by the audience, after which Rev. Dr. Talmage invoked the divine blessing upon the cargo. With the singing of the Doxology, the exercises closed.

Half an hour after noon, amid the cheers of the spectators and the stirring music of the band, the Buford steamed away from her dock and out toward the Pacific. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief flag streaming out as she moved down the bay. Among her passengers were twenty-five members of Congress and their wives, who are going to Honolulu, which will be her first port of call.

TALKS WITH NERVOUS WOMEN

you are aware that your nerves are getting the better of you, that instead of being useful servants carrying swift messages to the brain, they are disturbers of the peace that cause you annoyance and convenience, the part of wisdom is to seek for the a . Nerves in equipoise are the ministers of pleasure n not the heralds of torture.

diseased nerve in a tooth is a malignant fiend of oyed distress. Sometimes a dentist, finding that e in in no other way exorcise this demon, extracts it its place. You see a tiny thread, and you marvel h a thing so slight, so small, could have darkened a and sky with anguish, and interfered with every beneath the sun.

agine, instead of one little nerve out of gear, that nerves in general are for the time degenerate and le to fulfil their proper mission. Is it any wonder h despondency, ill temper, and possible insanity h in their wake? Very often a nervous woman ld altogether change her diet. Food does more h medicine to build up wasted nerves. Several years g conversing with an ent physician, I asked why American women so generally in danger ervous breakdown. His y was that as a rule erican women ate too y sweets and too little In his view it was es- ial that fats should com- a portion of the daily d of women in this ex- ng and stimulating at- sphere of ours. If anyone who ds this talk would like try the effect on herself a larger amount of fat in dietary, I pass the pre- iption along, in the hope t it may prove beneficial. t, let us admit that doc- s disagree. A nervous pa- nt was sent last summer the family practitioner a specialist whose fame widespread and who has ought many and marvel- s cures. She told him how e had denied herself what e liked and eaten what e did not like, and how, twithstanding her obedi- ce to medical advice, she d continually grown worse stead of better. He said her in substance: "My ar lady, you are nervous, cause you think too much out your nerves. You are speptic, because you orry too much about your gestion. Eat whatever u please, in moderation, except meat in summer. You ght as well wear a fur cloak in hot weather as eat eat then. Take a cold bath in the morning, walk three les every day, and go to bed at nine o'clock every ght."

When last I met this friend, she had gained flesh and lor, had lost much of her nervousness, and was on the gh road to complete recovery.

My conclusion is that plain food, well cooked, is a od thing for the nerves. If you are obliged to do your n cooking, you no doubt suffer at times from the al- ost invariable feeling of distaste and lack of appetite at come from too much and too long bending over a t stove. But if there is no one else to do the cooking, w are you to help yourself? The best way is to put mething aside, and eat when you are rested, and not hen you are tired. This may mean delay in getting ings out of the way, and may involve a little planning, t it is planning that will pay in the end.

Another helpful step in the cure of disturbed nerves is do something that you like, instead of spending all your time over something that you dislike. If you would like to work a pretty centrepiece, or a set of doilies, and if embroidery is to you a pastime and delight, let the children have fewer summer frocks, and spend your time, part of it, at least, in work that pleases your fancy. The labor we delight in physics pain.

A minister's wife in Western New York, having brought up a large family, having borne for years the anxieties incidental to raising children, clothing, feeding and educating them on her husband's small salary, found herself in middle life in danger of becoming a chronic invalid. Her good man carried lightly the burden of his fifty years, drove over miles of country to visit his parishioners, and preached Sunday after Sunday with as much earnestness and success as he had in his earlier years. He was a man of sanguine temperament, zealous and enthusiastic, a man from whom care rolled away, leaving few traces of its presence. His wife had known far more than he of the frictions and frets that come into church life, and people remarked how strange it was that she grew old so much faster than her husband. Looking into the glass one day, she observed it herself. "I am as nervous as a witch," she said. "My voice breaks into sharp cadences. Deep lines are coming into my face. I am losing my looks. I suppose I need a change of scene, but I can't get it, at any rate until Nancy comes home from college."

She was a woman of resource, and she decided that her best remedy would be to change the situation for herself by taking a course in novel-reading. She wrote to her friends who loved her and lived in greater ease, asking them to send her some good novels. She cautioned them against selecting those which were likely to tax the attention too much. "Send me something diverting and funny," she said, "something to make me laugh. I don't want to think. I want to be amused."

In her case, a course of judicious novel-reading lifted her out of the rut and proved to be precisely what she needed. One day a neighbor came in and found Mrs. Minister comfortably established in a rocking-chair, her feet on a foot-stool, and in her hand a book that had been very much talked of and that was extremely exciting. It was about ten o'clock in the morning, not an orthodox time for a housekeeper to be seen absorbed in a romance. The neighbor looked a little surprised, and taking the liberty that most people are ready to take with the wife of a pastor, inquired whether Mrs. M. intended cutting out the garments for the next missionary meeting. "I shall not attend it," said the lady, smiling; "just at present I am acting as a missionary to myself, and am getting well by amusing my leisure over books."

"Leisure!" exclaimed the visitor; "at ten o'clock in the morning?"

"Yes," said the other, firmly; "I have reached the place where I have found it necessary to maintain my ground and get my nerves in order, unless I want my husband one of these days to look out for a second wife."

In this instance, the time spent over stories was well spent. The period of nervous stress passed by, and the happy couple lived to celebrate their golden wedding.

Ex-President Cleveland and his Family at Princeton

MR. CLEVELAND, since his second retirement from the Presidency, has made his home in Princeton, N. J. He purchased a colonial mansion, which the fine artistic taste of Mrs. Cleveland has greatly beautified. The ex President's children are as bright a set of young people as could be found in a long day's journey. The boys especially are greatly interested in the baseball and football games that occur on the nearby campus of the college. Mr. Cleveland is a trustee of Princeton University. Although not taking an active part in politics, he writes and speaks frequently on topics of public interest. Recently he was elected a trustee of one of the great insurance companies, and his work has already done much to strengthen the confidence of the public in the concern with which he has become connected.

When Baby Comes

When the long-looked-for ship comes in that brings into safe harbor another traveler, there is, of course, the greatest rejoicing in the home. Even though Baby be not the important personage known as Number One in the family, and though the nursery have already a quota of little ones, the newcomer brings a welcome and claim that is at once paid in full in the Bank of Love.

How shall the mother announce the pleasant event to her friends? This question is asked by those who feel that so important an addition to the household should not be passed by in silence. The usual way of announcement is for the mother to send her visiting card to her friends with a tiny card attached to it by very narrow white ribbon. The tiny card is baby's first contribution to social amenities; it bears his or her name in full, with the date of birth. Occasionally a married couple go to a greater expense of having a special card engraved for the purpose of announcing the birth of a child. It reads after this manner: Mr. and Mrs. William Henry Montague on one line, and on the line below Percy Howard Montague in smaller type or script, with the date of his arrival. This method is very exceptional, and by no means in good taste. The prettier way is the one indicated, namely, the cards of mother and child fastened together by a ribbon. The mother, if she chooses, may send her visiting card, with baby's name and date simply written in the lower left-hand corner. The present fashion of pictorial postal cards has devised a baby's birthday card, in which the proverbial stork appears with a basket in his bill. In this reposes an infant. A tag attached to the basket leaves room for the baby's name and date. However, there is something a little common and coarse in this especial mode.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Dysortville, S. C. 1. What was the end of the apostle John? Did he die on Patmos? 2. Who committed the first sin after the flood?

1. Tradition, which is in this case apparently correct, has it that after being liberated from Patmos, he went to Ephesus, where he lived to extreme old age and died a natural death. 2. Noah drank himself into intoxication. (See Gen. 9: 21.)

J. H. L., Salix, Pa. If people build large mud dams above cities, or wall up the river bank so as to rob the water of its natural flow, thus when a great drought occurs, causing crop failure, is it right to say that it was caused by carelessness, or by greed, or that God sent a judgment on the people?

It would probably be the result of ignorance alone. Certainly, one need not conclude that people knowingly do things that will produce disaster to themselves as well as to others. In our own land, as all authorities agree, deforestation—the destruction of the woods by fires and for commercial purposes—must ultimately produce desert areas, with insufficient rainfall. If we violate nature's laws we must expect to suffer the consequences.

Ella B., Memphis, Tenn. Is it true that the Chinese empress dowager was originally a peasant of obscure birth, as a lecturer here recently asserted?

He was mistaken. Tse-Hsi was a Manchu of noble family, and was presented at court in her seventeenth year, when the late emperor chose her as his fifth wife. Her ability and wit soon made her the most influential of all. She bore him a son, and on her husband's death she ruled as co-regent with the first wife, until the young emperor became of age. When the son, after a short reign, died, she again became co-regent, this time for her nephew and adopted son, Kwang-Hsu. She surrendered the reins of government in 1889, but resumed them after the war with Japan, and she is to-day the real ruler of the empire.

I. H. D., New York. If we keep the first day of the week as the Sabbath, when God commanded us to keep the seventh, are we not transgressors of the law?

Are you desirous of keeping the law? It is a step backward and involves an extensive change in your habits, but there is no reason why you should not do it if you wish. Do not, however, try to persuade other people to follow your ridiculous example. If you read the Epistle to the Galatians you will see how indignant Paul was with the people who tried to fasten the law on the shoulders of the people whom Christ had set free. Peter too called it "a yoke which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear" (Acts 15: 10). If you choose to desert the practice of the whole Christian church, and cast in your lot with the Jews, in this matter, commemorating the creation of the world, and not the resurrection of the Lord, you are voluntarily returning to a bondage from which you have been freed.

W. M., Indianapolis, Ind. If the attendance at the Jamestown Exposition should fall short of expectations, will it not be owing largely to the fact that the Exposition, as the management frankly admits, is primarily a military and naval celebration? Do you believe that the American people, as a nation, are inordinately appreciative of military spectacles or warlike scenes by land or sea?

We suppose a good many people just now are asking themselves the same question. Frankly, we do not believe the nation has any military or naval craze whatsoever. But our correspondent and others need not fall into the error of supposing that there will not be an abundance of other attractions at Jamestown. The various State exhibits alone, when they are all in, will be worth a journey there to see.

Mrs. R. L., Seattle, Wash. I am seventy-eight years old. When I was a child I remember hearing a Mr. Eminston saying that if the Bible were destroyed, he could reproduce it word for word. I heard him make that statement in Walworth County, Wis., in 1850.

We have heard the same statement attributed to others. There is little doubt that so much of the "Book of books" has been lovingly memorized that, even if all the printed volumes, type and plates were destroyed, it could be reproduced practically complete.

W. M., Tumwater, Wash. We have not seen the statement you mention concerning China, but in any event it is very one-sided and unchristian. To us, it seems a plain and simple duty, that when people through no fault of their own are starving, we should help them no matter what causes may have produced this condition, and even though those who ought to have helped them fail to do so. Probably if all nations and governments and cabinets and corporations and individuals generally did their duty, there would be very little human suffering in the world. But that ideal time has not yet arrived.

A. B. B., Belle Vernon, Pa. What do you think of the "gift of tongues" movement? I am informed that many receiving it are able ministers of the Gospel.

It appears to be useless, of no benefit to themselves or others. The apostle Paul summed up the sensible estimate of the gift in a few words (I. Cor. 14: 19): "I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue."

F. J., Bangor, Wis. What is the meaning of the term "trunk lines"?

The trunk line is the main line of a railroad, used to distinguish it from its own branch lines, or lines of railroad owned or controlled by other companies that are "feeders" or branches to the main line.

Touched by the pitiful condition of the famine children in China, a reader in Los Angeles, Calif., sends us these lines:

Don't you hear the children crying
On that far-off foreign shore?
Will you give them just a little
From your ever bounteous store?

Little children, just as precious
To their mothers as your own;
While the father sits in anguish,
Heart and feelings turned to stone.

Just a little for the children,
For the sake of Him who said:
"Whoso one of these offendeth,
Better for him were he dead."

Oh the starving little babies,
Clutching at the fountain dry!
Save the little helpless children;
Don't you hear the babies cry?

J. W., Gold Hill, N. C. 1. Why is it that expeditions are sent out and continuous efforts are made to discover the North Pole, and not the South Pole? 2. What is a "mollycoddle"?

1. Every few years there have been exploring parties that have gone as far as they could toward the South Pole. At the present time another is being fitted out in Europe to try and discover it. The North Pole, however, is the point to which discoverers look with the greatest interest. 2. The dictionary defines a "mollycoddle" as a man who is effeminate in his ways; one without courage; a weakling.

W. R. M., Pasadena, Calif. Who is the author of the passage which goes substantially as follows: In olden times, fame meant being remembered, loved and honored a thousand years after you were dead. In a later age it meant that after two decades people still quoted with appreciation a dozen notable lines you had written or spoken. But now the only immortal fame the world knows is where one can set people's tongues wagging for nine days, when the wonder ceases.

Possibly some of our readers may be able to give the desired authority.

E. P., Searsboro, Ia. Can you give the population of the island of Ceylon, and what people inhabit it?

The last census was taken in 1901. There were then 3,578,333 people. The majority of the people are Singhalese in the south, and Tamils in the north. The rest are Eurasians, Moormen, Javanese, Parsees and Malays. There are 9,000 Europeans. The Veddahs, an aboriginal tribe of 1,000, dwell in the interior and have been hardly touched by civilization. Ceylon is a British crown colony.

Mrs. J. B. H., Bedford, Ia. Is there a passage in the Bible that reads, "The Lord tempers the wind to the shorn lamb"?

No. It is a quotation from the writings of Laurence Sterne.

T. F. W., Atlanta, Ga. Is there any intimation in the Bible that there are other worlds than ours, or does the idea that there are rests on science only?

If you mean inhabited worlds there is no evidence either in the Bible or in science. It is thought by many astronomers that Mars is inhabited because the marks which are on it have the appearance of having been made artificially. Other astronomers laugh the idea to scorn. There is, therefore, no absolute proof at present. The only passage in the Bible that has been regarded as suggesting such a theory is John 14: 2: "In my Father's house are many mansions."

G. M. E., St. Augustine, Fla. Is not the present famine in China a punishment of the Boxer uprising of years ago? Jeremiah 10: 25 appears to imply that it may be.

Christ taught us to be careful how we attributed calamities to God as a punishment for sin. (See Luke 13: 1-5.) Great suffering must not be regarded as implying great sin. The whole book of Job is a protest against the theory. We have no reason to suppose that these poor starving Chinese had any part in the Boxer rising. It is not God's habit to punish a man for the sin of another, even though he be of the same race.

Queen Victoria

The Royal Palace at Madrid, Spain

EVER since Princess Ena, of Battenberg, became Queen Victoria of Spain, her kindly ways and interest in her new land and subjects have made her very popular. The advent of an heir to the Spanish throne means much to the Spanish people, as it is a guarantee of the continuance of the monarchy, which means law and order in Spain. Crowds of loyal people in Madrid waited about the gates of the Royal Palace, watching for the standard to be displayed and the salute fired. The Palace is one of the most beautiful of those constructed at a period when the gloom of the medieval style of architecture was becoming modified.

In reference to a recent statement in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a reader, M. Govan, of Georgia, kindly sends us the following: "The first white child of English parents was born at Roanoke Island, which at that time was Virginian territory. The child's name was Virginia Dare. The colony was subsequently abandoned. I am not informed concerning the later history of Miss Virginia Dare."

Music at the Bowery Mission

THE men of the Bowery Mission recently enjoyed a rare pleasure when Mr. J. Granville Smith, the well-known English organist, visited the Mission and gave them an organ recital, and a demonstration of the new piano player. The Tel-Electric Piano Player Co., of 285 Fifth Avenue, New York City, kindly granted the use of a grand piano, with the necessary electric fixtures and music rolls. The men were wonderfully pleased and interested. Mr. Smith was ably assisted by Miss Marie Austin, a charming soprano soloist, who rendered selections from Gounod in splendid style.

INTO STILL WATERS

A NEW SERIAL STORY WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

CHAPTER X

WHEN Mrs. McGinnis had said that Margaret had stayed with her but ek, she had told the truth—but not whole truth. She said nothing what- about the cause of Margaret's leav- —and for the mother's peace of mind, ast, it was just as well, perhaps.

or a week Jack McGinnis had piloted rgaret to and from old Sullivan's at-shop each day, and then he had ked into his own attic tenement one ning crazed with drink. It was while vas raging around the room, brandish- a chair over his head, that Margaret been thoroughly frightened, and had g open the door and dashed down the rs. When she tried to go back, later, found she could not find her way, and as Sullivan, himself, that found her ing in a doorway. He listened care- y while she told her story, then he led with half-shut eyes and picked her in his arms.

"And I reckon you'll be for comin' ne with me then, and be my li'lle ," he said in her ear. And when rgaret screamed and struggled, he re- ted soothingly: "My li'lle gal—I'll at ye jest like my li'lle gal!" And did: he paid her no wages!

For two months Margaret was held a soner in the room with the eight Sulli- n children and the sick wife. Not once s she allowed on the street, lest some e of the McGinnis family should see . To tell the truth, the Sullivan ildren themselves were kept pretty sely indoors, lest the "school man" y them. School was a luxury for only e rich, Sullivan said—certainly not for poor man's children who had their daily ead to earn (and his). As for Marga- t, she, like little four-year-old Nanny, s too young for school, anyway, but e could pull bastings and sew on buttons en better than Nanny; and every little lped!

By the end of Margaret's two months' ork, however, Sullivan was weary of the nstant watch necessary to keep Marga- t indoors; and, not wishing to risk cGinnis's displeasure by letting him now where she had been all these weeks, e took the little girl away one night and anded her over to his cousin, Tom waney. He owed his cousin Tom a ood turn anyway, he said.

Swaney made paper bags in a cellar ot far from the Bowery, and Margaret on found that paste and paper could be lly as unmanageable as were thread nd needles at the first. She found, also, at Swaney's raps, cuffs and shakes were dministered with even greater force than is cousin's had been.

There were many boys and girls in waney's cellar, and they all pasted bags. hey stayed there day and night, too—it as safer, Swaney said. (He, also, eared the "school man," it seemed.) waney himself did not like to work; either did his wife, nor his wife's rother. But, after all, they did not eed to work, for the six little Swaneys and the other children could turn out many, many thousand bags every week. To be sure, some of these children must be paid a few cents for their work; but there were others concerning whom Swaney was more fortunate—his own children, Margaret, and a boy whose father had died since placing him there.

Twice Margaret ran away from the Swaney cellar; and twice she was brought back. Her third flight was more successful; she was six years old then, and her wits had been sharpened by adversity. On the very first day of her freedom she ran after an old man on the street and restored a fallen parcel, thereby earning ten cents; and it was this ten cents that had given her the first sweet taste of the bread of independence.

"'Oh,' cried Mrs. Kendall, 'perhaps it is my little girl!'"

She slept that night behind a big pile of bales on a wharf; and before the week was out she had made the acquaintance of twin girls of her own age, with an older sister of thirteen. By them she was instructed in various arts likely to be of use to her; begging (cautiously, and with an eye out for "cops"); "swiping" (still more cautiously, and with a still more wary eye out for the "cops"); errand-running and baby-tending (always to be done "on the straight," but never to be done at all when anything easier offered).

Nor did the ministrations of the three new friends stop here. Margaret was graciously invited to share the girls' co-operative housekeeping establishment in one corner of the basement room belonging to a good-natured woman who had taken pity on their houseless condition. Margaret had accepted at once, and was more than glad to contribute her all to the general fund; for—be it understood—the occupancy of the corner meant merely room-rent, not board. The children must procure for themselves whatever food they had, as their good landlady, Mrs. Whalen, had many mouths of her own to feed on the other side of the room.

The Whalens made paper flowers. The children, it is true, went to school—a part of the time; but early in the morning before school, and late at night after school, they worked with their mother, making artificial roses at nine cents a dozen. Mrs. Whalen very obligingly taught Margaret the art, and generously allowed her the pittance she earned. At times the little girl worked very hard over the bright colored bits of cloth, sitting up until far into the night, and until she fell asleep over the work; but as a usual thing it was easier to beg a nickel from a passer-by, or to steal a loaf of bread or an apple from an unguarded cart. As for school—Margaret knew little of that. The "school man" did not seem to know of her existence.

For two years now Margaret Kendall had lived in the basement room. She was eight now, a lithe, thin-chested, sharp-featured creature, very unlike the little maid that had been left in the Grand Central Station three years before. The blue eyes were there, it is true, but they were no longer limpidly sweet; they were bright, wide open, and keenly alert for "the best chance." The golden curls were there, also, but they were tangled untidily. Three years of abuse and neglect had told woefully upon the child. All the graces of mind and body that were hers by heredity and early training seemed to have slipped from her, leaving her fully exposed to the evils of her environment. Little by little the old ways had been dropped, little by little the old manner of speaking had been forgotten; and Margaret Kendall, dainty, sweet, and lovable, had become "Mag of the Alley," pert, mischievous and wilful—but still lovable, for nothing had quite taken away the warm, tender little heart.

CHAPTER XI

MRS. McGINNIS, Bobby, and the nurse had been sent at once to Houghtonsville, and were now with a rejoicing mother and grandmother in the little red farmhouse on the hill; but Mrs. Kendall and the doctor had remained in New York, she with friends, and he at a hotel not far away.

Little as Dr. Spencer felt that he ought to leave Houghtonsville for so long a time, he utterly refused to let Mrs. Kendall conduct her search without his assistance. Twice a week he made a flying midnight trip to visit such of his patients as had refused to be turned over to either of the other physicians in town. The remaining days of the week he spent tramping the New York streets at Mrs. Kendall's side.

The search was very different from what it had been during those weeks after Mrs. Kendall had left the hospital. Then she had visited police courts and orphan asylums; now she walked from one end to the other of the worst streets of New York, peering into the face of every little girl she met. Long hours were spent in consulting city missionaries and the kind-hearted men and women in the various Homes and Settlement houses; but nowhere did she find a trace of a blue-eyed, golden-haired child that answered to the description she gave.

Mrs. McGinnis had never found the courage to tell her kind benefactress of the attic room around the corner where

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

"THAT'S the son, that's the son," was the exclamation that ran along the crowds by the reviewing stand at the Jamestown Exposition, as Major-General Frederick Dent Grant rode by at the head of the troops on opening day. Old veterans present, noting the striking resemblance of the General to his famous father, U. S. Grant, of the Civil War, felt a strange thrill as if their honored leader were back in the saddle again. The present General will be in command during the entire run of the Exposition and will receive all of the distinguished foreigners who will come to represent their governments here. He was born in St. Louis in 1850. He graduated from West Point and for a time served in the cavalry. He resigned and became minister to Austria, and then police commissioner of New York. At the outbreak of the war with Spain he was made a brigadier-general. He served in Puerto Rico and the Philippines; in the latter he fought the battles of Big Bend and Binacian. He was appointed to the regular army in 1901.

HENRY PRATT JUDSON is the new president of Chicago University, in which he has long been dean of the faculty of arts and sciences and professor of political economy. He was born in Jamestown, N. Y., in 1849, and graduated from Williams College in 1870. He holds a Doctor's degree from Queen's College, Toronto, Canada. He started his career as a teacher in a high school, and later went to the University of Minnesota. In 1892 he was called to Chicago. He has written much on history, the classics and literature. As head of a great university he has yet greater opportunity to carry out his educational ideals.

"MAKER OF MODERN EGYPT" is the proud title won by Lord Cromer, who has just given up the post of British representative in the land of the Khedive. When England stepped into Egyptian affairs, they were in about as bad a state as they could possibly be after years of misrule and civil war. Lord Cromer has been one of Britain's great empire-builders, and it was of him that Lord Milner wrote: "In him the qualities of the race have triumphed." He became consul-general in Egypt in 1883. Before going there he had long diplomatic experience in India. He was created an earl in 1901. He has not only managed political affairs in Egypt, but also looked keenly after the material prosperity of the people.

THERE is no department of public work that has made greater strides in public interest than the United States Geological Survey, whose new director is George Otis Smith. Mr. Smith is a geologist of note, though a young man. He was born in 1871, in Hodgdon, Me. From early days he has been interested in scientific subjects. He has been engaged in geological research since 1893.

New York's Tent Campaign

CARNEGIE HALL was crowded on April 30, at the mass-meeting held to inaugurate the third season of open-air and tent evangelistic work in New York City. Rev. Wilton Merle Smith presided and E. A. Wayne led the great chorus of singers. Rev. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson led in prayer and Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington in the responsive reading of the Scriptures.

Rev. C. L. Goodell, in his address, said the creed needed to-day is "the creed of the blind man healed by Jesus—'One thing I know: I was blind, now I see.' In this hall, where so recently the dove of international peace has dwelt, it is well to remember that before inward peace can prevail there must be peace with God in each individual heart." He called for enthusiasm in Christian work, backed up by sincere motives. He told the story of Peter Appel, a fresh recruit of the Eleventh Indiana Regiment before Vicksburg, who, when ordered to charge, stopped not till he mounted the works and captured a prisoner and returned with him to the Union lines. When questioned by his comrades where he got his man, he said: "I got him up there; lots of 'em up there if you go after them." If New York is to be reached, we must go after the men.

Rev. Dr. Schauffler illustrated with stereopticon the tent work, and urged a loyal support for the Executive Committee in this campaign.

Dr. Smith, in introducing Dr. J. B. Ely, superintendent of the Tent Campaign, called him the "incarnation of sanctified persistence." By his appeal, $5,000 was added at once by subscription to the $10,000 in hand toward the required $50,000.

The closing address was by "Gipsy" Smith, who is just returning to England after a vacation in which he has preached four hundred times. He said that men of money and women of leisure owed it to the masses of people, who had helped them to enjoy their privileges, to support this spiritual work. He urged people of wealth to get open-air treatment for their ills caused by idleness, and to visit some of the tents, for those children of the streets are worth saving. He told a story of two young men with aristocratic ambitions meeting on the road to Manchester a ragged urchin with a donkey, and asking him: "What will you take for the donkey?" The boy, who was not a simpleton, although his clothes were distinguished for free ventilation, replied: "Can your mother afford to keep two?" The speaker urged this Gospel work for the children and the men who were down, stating that it was the mission of Jesus to save the lost, the last and the least man.

Last year $40,000 was expended on the Tent Campaign in Greater New York. This year $50,000 is needed for the season's work.

From Golden Gate to Tokio

Notes of a Missionary Journey on a Floating University

By WILBUR F. CRAFTS

IS it practicable to have a floating university on a great ocean steamship? An affirmative answer is suggested by the extemporized but very successful missionary institute held on the steamship Mongolia of the Pacific Mail Line, en route from San Francisco to Japan and China, on which each morning at 9.30 o'clock, and each evening at 9.45, we have gathered in the corner of the dining-room day after day to hear Prof. H. B. Beach, Yale professor of missions, a Congregationalist; Rev. David S. Spencer, a Northern Methodist missionary, who has worked in Japan for many years; Rev. W. R. Lambuth, formerly missionary in China, and now missionary secretary of the Southern Methodist Church, and Dr. D. Eubank, a Baptist medical missionary in China, who is about to conduct a deputation of forty Baptist laymen and preachers through Japan and China.

With something like the thoroughness of a college lecture course, the speakers, profitably and entertainingly, gave instruction during the voyage. Prof. Beach, Dr. D. Eubank and Rev. George B. Smyth were the chief instructors on China, and Dr. Spencer on Japan. On the night before we reached Hawaii, Dr. Lambuth told the romantic story of this morning land of American missions.

In Honolulu, Governor Carter, one of the group of missionaries' sons who are the moral, and political, and commercial leaders of the Hawaiian Islands, proudly displayed as the most interesting and representative exhibit of his office a large photograph of a Hawaiian public school in which the children of more than a score of nationalities were studying together, with Asiatic races taking their full share of honors. "It was in just such a school as this that I was educated," said the governor. What seems strange to visiting Americans is to find that some who were once Chinese "coolies," that is, simply the farmer class from which every nation recruits its sturdiest leaders, are found even in the social gatherings of Honolulu's refined society, where culture and character, rather than color, are the bases of selection. There are many beautiful Chinese homes with tasteful exteriors, and pianos and pictures within, which, if the family were absent, might be taken for the homes of middle-class Americans.

The Hawaiian-Japanese, already a majority of the population, are likely to become the controlling majority of the citizens in their next generation. This is no ground for political alarm, but is a loud call to increased support of the mission work for Chinese and Japanese in Hawaii, under the management of the Hawaiian Board of Missions, of which Rev. E. W. Thwing is the leader.

At Honolulu, where our steamship paused for a day, your correspondent spoke to the Territorial Senate on three pending moral issues—the curfew, local option and opium. A new reform sheriff is enforcing the curfew ordinance, long neglected and much needed to protect young girls especially, and a proposal to amend the law gave opportunity to speak of its great influence in reducing juvenile crime in four thousand American towns. One of several changes for the worse in Hawaii, due to annexation, is that the prohibition of opium has been lost. When opium importation was prohibited, and the drug was therefore contraband, there was almost no use of the drug by native Hawaiians, Governor Carter assured us; but under the new plan of merely regulating its sale like other poisons, there is an increase in its vicious use, which, however, is not yet common, and we urged action that would stamp it out before it becomes too difficult.

Intemperance is seriously increasing, especially among native Hawaiians, who, under their own kings, were for sixty years protected by prohibition. As usual, some good men are ready to compromise on such makeshifts as one saloon to each 2,000 population. We urged the fact that 42 of our 45 States give the people the right of home rule on the liquor question, and that 33,000,000 of our people are now living under this and other forms of prohibition.

Among the eminent passengers on our ship journeying to Asia, was Hon. Dean C. Worcester, the sole survivor in the present Philippine government of two Philippine Commissions. He gave to the assembled passengers an instructive address on the wild tribes, which he commonly speaks of as "the non-Christian tribes," of which the most important part was his reference to their religions. There were two tribes in whom he could discover no trace of religion. The rude worship of the other tribes is fairly represented by a tribe which believes that at death a man goes to a cave leading to the centre of the earth, where a demon standing beside a fire halts him and asks what sort of a life he has lived. The answer is fully given by a parasite that from his birth to his death has lived continuously on the top of his head. If its story is unfavorable, the man goes to the fire; but if favorable, he goes down to the "seventh heaven." Mr. Worcester reported success in prohibiting "head-hunting" by Philippine savages, despite centuries of custom; and anticipated success in prohibiting liquor-selling among these tribes.

Influential endorsements have also been given at the Yokohama local Endeavor meeting and at the National Endeavor Convention and at a banquet tendered us by educational, political and commercial leaders of Tokio at San-en-Tei, to the great petition addressed "to all civilized governments," asking them to prohibit, by laws and treaties, the sale of intoxicants and opium to all uncivilized peoples. This petition, representing 19,000,000 of Americans and thousands of British people, was graciously received, in behalf of the Japanese government, by Viscount Hayashi, the foreign secretary, to whom we were presented by the American ambassador, Hon. Luke E. Wright.

Washington's New Mission

FOR a quarter of a century Mr. George W. Wheeler has stood at the head of an efficient corps of workers who have used the "gospel wagon" of the Central Union Mission, in Washington, D. C., as a means for the ingathering of many souls. Mr. Wheeler, since severing his connection with the Central Union Mission, has taken his place at the head of the recently established "Gospel Mission" at No. 1230 Pennsylvania Avenue located in a section of the Capital City which is given over to pool-rooms, saloons and kindred evils. It is the purpose of the new mission and its workers to seek out the reckless men and erring girls who are to be found in large numbers in this immediate neighborhood.

The half-a-hundred consecrated men and women who have enlisted for the work under Mr. Wheeler's leadership are hoping to secure a gospel wagon, their years of experience having taught them that such a means of circulating the gospel message has proved a powerful engine in soul-winning. Washington has a large floating population of sight-seers who come from every quarter of the civilized world, and many wonderful conversions may be directly traced to the instrumentality of these street meetings.

A letter from the mission declaring its purpose and its need says: "I am sure the dear Lord will send the money with which to get a gospel wagon, for he knows that this Mission was born of prayers from hearts dedicated to his cause." We believe that the friends of gospel and rescue work will justify the faith of these tireless laborers in the vineyard, and that they will receive the money they need to begin their gospel wagon summer campaign. Further information will be gladly furnished and contributions gratefully acknowledged by Mr. George W. Wheeler, 1230 Pennsylvania Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C.

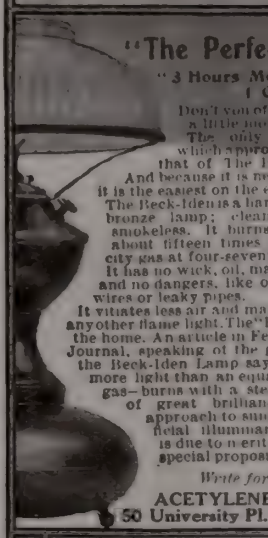
"BECK-IDEN"



"The Perfect Light"
"3 Hours More Daylight—1 Cent.

Don't you often long for "just a little more daylight"?

The only artificial light which approaches daylight is that of The Beck-Iden Lamp. And because it is nearest to daylight it is the easiest on the eyes.

The Beck-Iden is a handsome, portable, bronze lamp; clean, odorless and smokeless. It burns gas; and gives about fifteen times more light than city gas at four-sevenths the cost.

It has no wick, oil, mantle or chimney; and no dangers, like oil lamps, crossed wires or leaky pipes.

It vitiates less air and makes less heat than any other flame light. The "Perfect Light" for the home. An article in Feb'y Ladies Home Journal, speaking of the gas generated by the Beck-Iden Lamp says: "Gives much more light than an equal amount of city gas—burns with a steady, white flame of great brilliancy—the nearest approach to sunlight of any artificial illuminant." This praise is due to merit only. We have a special proposition to make you.

HANG ON

Coffee Topers as Bad as Others.

"A friend of our family who lived with us a short time was a great coffee drinker and a continual sufferer with dyspepsia. He admitted that coffee disagreed with him, but you know how the coffee drinker will hold on to his coffee, even if he knows it causes dyspepsia.

"One day he said to me that Postum Food Coffee had been recommended and suggested that he would like very much to try it. I secured a package and made it according to directions. He was delighted with the new beverage, as was every one of our family. He became very fond of it and in a short time his dyspepsia disappeared. He continued using the Postum and in about three months gained twelve pounds.

"My husband is a practising physician and regards Postum as the healthiest of all beverages. He never drinks coffee, but is very fond of Postum. In fact all of our family are, and we never think of drinking coffee any more." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Doctors at War on Alcohol

*By Alexander Alison, D.D.

THE old discussion concerning alcohol has broken out again in lively form in Great Britain. Dispatches from London tell us that sixteen distinguished disciples of Æsculapius have affixed their signatures to the following, to which our American papers have been giving generous circulation:

Recognizing that, in prescribing alcohol, the requirements of the individual must be the governing rule, we are convinced of the correctness of the opinion so long and generally held that in disease alcohol is a rapid and trustworthy restorative. In many cases it may truly be described as life-preserving, owing to its power to sustain cardiac nervous energy while protecting wasting nitrogenous issues. . . . As an article of diet we hold that the universal belief of civilized mankind that the moderate use of alcohol is, for adults, usually beneficial is amply justified. . . . We deplore the evils arising from the use of alcoholic beverages, but it is obvious that there is nothing beneficial which does not by excess become injurious.

The old saying, "Doctors differ," is not less true in this instance than in a large number of others. Less than half a century ago it was difficult to find physicians who would express much respect for the positions taken and strenuously held by the advocates of total abstinence. The average doctor in the olden time had a kind word for alcoholic liquors. How is it to-day? It would not be easy, on this side of the Atlantic at least, to find even as many as the noted "sixteen" whose names are found accompanying the instrument which has been quoted above. Thousands of leading medical practitioners may be gathered together on both sides of the ocean who will seriously question the position taken by the noted medical men who endorse the statement given to the public.

Sir Andrew Clark, M.D., physician to her late Majesty Queen Victoria, may be quoted as follows:

Alcohol is a poison. So is strychnine; so is arsenic; so is opium. It ranks with these. The health is always in some way or other injured by it; benefited by it—never!

N. S. Davis, M.D., says:

No form of alcoholic drink is capable of either warming, strengthening, nourishing or sustaining the life of any human being.

Prof. Youmans says:

All alcohol is the product of death and decay.

Sir William Gull, M.D., says:

I hardly know any more potent cause of disease than alcohol.

R. D. Mussey, M.D., says:

So long as alcohol retains a place among sick patients, so long will there be drinkers. . . .

I deny that alcoholic spirit is essential to the practice either of physic or surgery.

Benjamin Ward Richardson, M.D., says:

I had learned purely by experimental observation that in its action on the living body this chemical substance, alcohol, deranges the constitution of the blood; unduly excites the heart and respiration; paralyzes the minute blood-vessels; increases and decreases, according to the degree of its application, the functions of the digestive organs, of the liver, and of the kidneys; disturbs the regularity of nervous action, lowers the normal temperature and lessens the muscular power. Such, independently of any prejudice of party or influence of sentiment, are the unanswerable teachings of the sternest of all evidences, the evidence of experiment, of natural fact revealed to man by experimental testing of natural phenomena. Alcohol begins by destroying; it ends by destruction, and it implants organic changes which progress independently of its presence, even in those who are not born.

Dr. John H. Griscom says:

I have come to the conclusion that alcohol as a medicine can be wholly dispensed with.

When I was in London two years ago, Sir Frederick Treves, Bart., K.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S., Sergeant Surgeon-in Ordinary to the King (Edward VII.) and Surgeon-in-Ordinary to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, delivered an address at the Church House, Westminster, under the auspices of the Women's Union, C.E.T.S. In that address he said among other things the following:

The point in regard to alcohol is simple enough. It is a poison, and it is a poison which, like other poisons, has certain uses; but the limitations in the use of alcohol should be as strict as the limitations in the use of any other kind of poison. Moreover, it is an insidious poison, in that it produces effects which seem to have only one anti-dote—alcohol again. This applies to another drug equally insidious, and that is morphia or opium. Unfortunately, the term poison is by no means an exaggerated one, when it is realized that with alcohol, as drunk by many of the poorer classes, there is apt to be mixed a very definite poison in the form of fusel oil. There is no disguising the fact that alcohol is of late years less used by the medical profession. . . Some people say: "Alcohol is a most excellent appetizer. There can be no possible harm in a little before a meal." No appetite needs to be artificially stimulated. There is no need, supposing this property of alcohol to be true, to use anything that will excite an appetite.

Alcohol produces an increased heart-beat, a fuller pulse and redder skin. It calls upon the reserve power of the man, but the moment the effect is passed off, the action of the heart is actually weakened. Consequently the temporary effect is produced at an unfortunate cost. Alcohol is certainly inconsistent with what may be called fine work. It is inconsistent with a surgeon's work and with anything that requires a quick, accurate and alert judgment. I am much struck with the fact that many professional men have discontinued the use of stimulants in the middle of the day. Why? For no other reason in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred than that they find they can work better without it. . . . No one who is young and healthy can want alcohol any more than he can want strychnine.

What, then, is the conclusion we arrive at? Is it not that the consensus of highly skilled medical opinion is against the use of alcohol in health or disease, in youth or age, under any conditions? If we follow the burden of scholarly scientific opinion upon this subject, we shall be forced to the conclusion, however much we respect the distinguished "sixteen" who have signed the statement referred to in the beginning of this article, that they are in such a hopeless minority that any jury would be under the necessity of deciding against them.

If any one desires fuller study of the whole question, many elaborate treatises covering the entire field may be found in the catalogue of our publications issued from the headquarters of the National Temperance Society and Publication House, 3 East Fourteenth Street, New York City. I shall be pleased to send a copy of this catalogue to any address on application.

Books Received

"Is success a mere matter of luck?" asks Mr. Emil Reich at the beginning of his series of essays entitled Success in Life. Such chapter-headings as "The Mother," "Education," "Religion," etc., give the prospective reader an idea of the point of view of the author, who discusses his subject upon all sides. Fox, Duffield & Co., New York. Pp. 350. Price $1.50.

The Sacrifice of Praise, a new compilation of sacred songs, needs little introduction to the persons who know that it is issued by Grant C. Tullar and I. H. Meredith. "God's Summerland" and "My Pilot" are especially tuneful melodies. Tullar-Meredith Co., 150 Fifth Avenue, New York. Pp. 251. Price 35 cents, postpaid; $25 per hundred, not prepaid.

Mr. John D. Freeman takes ten chapters to give his readers an interpretation of the Twenty-third Psalm, which he calls Life on the Uplands. Nor are those chapters too many or too long to convey to the anxious questionings of the human heart an assured conviction, renewed and strengthened by Mr. Freeman's tender exposition, of God's watchful loving care as revealed in the "Shepherd Psalm." Pp. 139. Price 75 cents. A. C. Armstrong & Son, 3 West Eighteenth Street, New York City.

In The Old Darnman, first published by Success in an abbreviated form, the Rev. Charles L. Goodell, D.D., has exquisitely preserved the pathetic history of a life known to the villages of fifty years ago in a certain section of New England. When the story of the Darnman first appeared, many letters of reminiscence were received, and one historical society verified the quaint story's foundation in fact. It is a little gem and should become a New England classic. Pp. 63. Price 40 cents. Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York and London.

Miracles in the Slums, by Rev. Seth Cook Rees, reveals the power of the Gospel to reach the most hardened cases and change the life from sin to holiness, and records many modern miracles in rescue work. Many of the experiences recorded are most pathetic and will make the reader wish there were more such earnest laborers in the work of rescuing the fallen. The book will awaken an interest in rescue work wherever it goes. Pp. 300. Forty full page illustrations. Price $1.00. J. E. Jewett, 604 Lexington Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

No intelligent woman, who desires to see the scourge of intemperance removed from the land, has forgotten the intrepid action of Mrs. Eliza Trimble Thompson, the Ohio leader of the woman's crusade upon the saloons. An intensely interesting compilation of sketches, now in its second edition, is given to the public under the title of Hillsboro Crusade Sketches and Family Records. The book is edited by the Rev. Davis W. Clark, D.D., and its value will increase as the scenes it depicts, embodying the early history of the great temperance movement, fall into the background. Pp. 291. Illustrated. Price $1.10, postpaid. Jennings & Graham, Cincinnati.

Oh!" cried Mrs. Kendall, eagerly,
"perhaps it's my little girl! Is she timid and gentle, and does she use queer big words?"

The woman opposite chuckled until her sides shook, and until the red rose in her hand danced a merry jig.

"'Timid'! Maggie 'timid'! Well, hardly, now. I reckon ye ain't on the right track if ye're after that kind. Sure, Mag of the Alley is the terror of the hull street, an' thar ain't a gal—an' not many b'ys—this side of the Bowery that can hould out agin' her if she takes a notion ter have her own way—an' I'm blest if that ain't the notion she most ginerally does take! Thar don't no one git the best of her, I can tell ye. An' yit—sure I like her in spite of her pesterin' ways. Thar's many a good turn she's done me!"

Again Mrs. Kendall shivered. This time she drew away toward the door, with an appealing glance at the doctor.

"You're quite right, my good woman," she said huskily. "I am very sure she is not the little girl I am looking for. Thank you for answering my questions," she added hurriedly, dropping two bills on to the table; "and—and one is for her—that little girl, just for the sake of the blue eyes," she faltered, as she backed out the door.

"Doctor, doctor, how can they live like that?" she cried a little later, as they hurried down the street. "And to think that somewhere, somewhere in all this want and misery is my Margaret—my dear, tender little girl. Sometimes, doctor, I think I shall lose my mind with the horror of it all—the awful horror of it all!"

It was that very thing that the doctor feared, and it was that very thing that caused him to spend what time he could at Mrs. Kendall's side. He was there when at last the frail, overtaxed body gave out, and it was he that took the broken-hearted woman back to Houghtonsville, to the lonely house with the big stone lions on either side of the steps, and the little woolly dog all alone in the middle of a sunlit room.

Our Southern Mountaineers*

EW if any districts of our broad land present opportunities for Christian work so hopeful as do the mountain ons of the South. A recent visitor ribes the people as "unspoiled." The l is a true characterization. Poverty not appear to have hardened and unanized these men and women, as it the dwellers in the slums of our great s. Not in all the mountain settlements d the look of fierce, hungry rapacity ound on a face, as it is on the faces of denizens of the sweat-shops of New k and Chicago. There is anger there, er animosity, as we know; but it is the er of men who are injured, or believe nselves to be injured, not the glare men have who are like dogs ready to t over a bone. Kindness and hospiy and friendly readiness to help as far ibility goes, may be found throughout section. Fine traits of character, e, a good foundation for the culture development which are sure to come. he whole section is awaking to the dencies which are the result of its long usion. The younger people are seeking style and polish of city manners, the eer of civilization, which too often es wood far inferior to that of the untain character. One may hope that en they get it, they will not lose their ial friendliness, the bluff honesty and nright sincerity of their fathers. It is ood sign that they appreciate learning that they are willing to make sacrifices to get it. We hear of their walking long distances morning and night to attend school or to get access to a library, and of their delight in music and other accomplishments. All this will tend to a higher civilization and a more intelligent grasp of our social problems.

After all, it must be remembered—and this the good men who have gone there in the service of Christ are impressing upon them—it is character that tells. The honest truth-telling man is a better man, though he cannot even read or write, than the suave, polished cultured rascal who has the vices of the city. The mountaineers appreciate this fact, as such colleges as Berea and Lincoln and others prove. Culture is good, but it should be Christian culture; and the most hopeful sign is that it is this the mountaineers are seeking.

The Bitlis Earthquake

In a letter to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Rev. W. W. Peet, treasurer of American Missions in Turkey, writes from Constantinople:

"I thank you for your kind response to my cable (appealing for Bitlis). Mr. Cole's estimate of the situation seems to be fully sustained by the telegrams received here through official channels. Reuter's agent received the following from Mr. Cole: 'Shocks less frequent. Centre seems to be here and to trend southward, where seven villages were destroyed. People are slowly regaining confidence, but high prices and general poverty and suffering continue.'"

Further details of the closing scenes at the sailing of the relief ship will appear in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

That the arrival of the famine relief ship will be a welcome event in China is made clearer than ever by the cablegrams received within the last few days. The editor of the North China Herald, on April 30 (the day of the Buford's sailing from San Francisco), cabled from Shanghai to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Arrival Buford cargo anxiously awaited. Harvest prospects now extremely discouraging. Prolongation foreign assistance absolutely necessary."

Two days earlier, on April 28, Secretary McCrea, of the Missionary Committee, cabled this message:

"Send all help you can. Tsingkiangpu employing 100,000 men on relief works. Suchien and Hsuchoufou feeding 75,000 families. Harvest may relieve conditions during summer, but fear conditions later."

These messages, following on the resolution adopted at the meeting of delegates to the great China Centennial Conference, appealing for further and immediate aid for famine relief, were promptly answered. Dr. Klopsch cabled to the Shanghai Centennial Conference as follows:

"Responding your appeal, CHRISTIAN HERALD cables through State Department another fifty thousand gold, April 30, also sends army transport Buford with full cargo same date with more to follow. Numbers 6: 24, 25, 26."

Advices from the famine field, received this week, show that the relief work is being pushed with immense activity at all points except in the remote west.

Rev. L. C. Beals writes from Ma-Tseng: "I am at this moment on the outposts of the famine district in Northern Kiangsu. I came here over two weeks ago to help Dr. James Wood, Dr. Morgan and Mr. Rice, of Tsingkiangpu, distribute the flour which our good American people have so freely given to these poor suffering mortals.

"My pen cannot fully picture the sorrow and misery on every side. Thousands upon thousands have died and many hundreds of thousands will yet die, for the supplies cannot be sent fast enough into the interior to save all. Neither are there missionaries enough to do the work.

"I was asked to take a two day's trip farther inland on a wheelbarrow, to superintend the flour distribution. Mr. Caldwell, of the Presbyterian Mission, was to be with me for a few days. On our way through the refugee camps we had a hard time to pass, as the poor creatures would get hold of us and beg for help. We had to use force at times to break away.

"We passed a man and woman who were miserable looking objects. They told us they had just left their infant baby on the roadside to die. Sure enough, in a few moments we came up to it lying on the side of a grave. The poor thing was about four days old and almost naked. The air was quite chilly, and the infant was moaning and drawn up as though in pain.

"The first day here we gave out 2,100 tickets for flour, and the next 900. We have here 3,000 families of five or more, which means 15,000 people who will be fed from this station until autumn.

"The mobs that come to our door in the mornings are a sorry lot. Many have to be turned away. We could not handle more at one station.

"At night, when alone, I hear the bang! bang! of the robber guns. This has a tendency to keep one awake, for there is grave danger of their breaking in on this supply depot. It is true they fear the foreigner, but when many of them are hungry they become emboldened. I wish we could do more for them, poor things."

Writing from Pochou, a correspondent of the North China Herald says:

"I have made a trip to Yungchinghsun and saw there some of the sad effects of the famine. In several places were dead bodies being eaten by dogs. One likely-looking boy, fairly well dressed, lay dead on the street. We met thousands of wheelbarrows laden with grain going from this place and farther west in the direction of the more distressed region. One day last week in the press for food, six persons were reported crushed to death. Two thousand cash is allowed to the family of each of these dead persons. The official told me the other day that so soon as this instalment of rice was sold, he would then distribute the government grain here to the people. He says they also have a fund from the governor and citizens to distribute in cash so soon as this grain gives out."

Missionary Ideals*

MERE change of belief, giving up of idols and being baptized, does not comprise the whole object of missions. It is conceivable that the king or chief of a heathen land might issue an edict that every one of his subjects should be baptized and the edict be obeyed and yet the country still be idolatrous. The object of missions, like the object of Christ's coming to the world, is to redeem the people from their sin, to lead them by the power of Christ and his Gospel to abandon sin, forsake it, hate it and utterly and forever renounce it. When a whole people does that, and earnestly seeks after holiness, the land is Christianized and the work of missions is accomplished. But the work even then is not ended. Children are being born, who must be reached; for they are not born into the kingdom of God, but must have the second birth, which is the work of the Holy Spirit. So, as in Christian lands, there is constant and continuous need of the proclamation of the Gospel; yet there is hope that a Christianized heathen land may not be a permanent mission field, but may educate and train each new generation in the faith it has received.

The task of the missionary is stupendous. He has to contend with national prejudices, with principles and ideals handed down from earlier generations, and which are in many cases, as in China, held sacred for their very antiquity. Besides this, there may be, as in Japan, a tendency to regard Christianity as a mere adjunct of civilization. When there is a desire to imitate Western nations and note how rich and influential they are, there springs up an idea that Christianity may have been, in part at least, the cause of their prosperity, and so it may be accepted from a purely secular motive. Christianity is never likely to be permanent in any land in which it is regarded merely as a means of getting on. The people soon find out that by adopting Western methods, without the Christian faith, they can become prosperous. They learn that Christianity means self-denial and that it is a hindrance to some methods of getting on. The missionary has to get them to adopt Christianity on principle, regardless of worldly motive. He must, in a word, teach them to renounce their sin.

Preparation for Service

By Mrs. M. Baxter

GOD'S workshop is everywhere, and his chief work is man. But the very greatness of the destiny of . his masterpiece in creation, the possi- . ies which he has dared to put within . scope of a human being who responds . him, accounts for the long suffering and . patience of God in accomplishing the . cation and perfecting of man in his . ge. We are his workmanship (Eph. . 10) in a sense that no other part of the . ation can be, for all other created . gs subserve the interests of God in his . paration of man for himself; they are . the scaffolding of the building in . ch the great Architect delights. His . dings with Abraham, Joseph and . ses are a clue to his dealings with . se who, throughout the Christian dis- . sation, have understood. They have . ognized that the Church is called out . m the Gentiles to be a people for his . me (Acts 15:14); and they have per- . ally accepted the call, and therefore . purpose of their life differs from many . h whom they are closely associated.

From the moment of his birth Moses . s a child of faith. His parents were . t carried away with the idolatry which . evailed among their compatriots, and . y were not afraid of the king's com- . ndment (Heb. 11:23). Faith cannot . r; it sees God above all the power of . n, and rests in his faithfulness. How . eir child should be brought up and saved . m the malicious hate of the Egyptian . gs, they did not inquire; faith asks no . estions, but enters into rest (Heb. 4:3). . e time came when this child could no . nger be hidden. What then? God had . opted him, and no doubt he put it into . e mother's heart to think of the strange . pedient of making a little floating . adle, and committing it to the brink of . e River Nile, among the flags which . ew there. But the watchful eye of . iriam, his sister, was on the frail ark of . lrushes with its little burden so precious . her, so precious to God.

The overruling hand of God brought . e king's daughter to bathe just in this . rt of the river where the child of Amram . nd Jochebed (Ex. 6:20) lay. The eye of . e royal princess was attracted by the . ttle rude vessel; and when one of her . aidens that brought it to her, had . pened it, and found within it a little . ailing babe, all the woman in her was . oved, and she said: "This is one of the . Hebrews' children." Miriam was at hand, . nd, approaching the princess, seized the . pportunity: "Shall I go and call to thee . nurse of the Hebrew women, that she . ay nurse the child for thee?" (verse 7). . 'Go," said the daughter of the king, and . Miriam fetched the child's mother.

What a reward to Jochebed's faith! . ow little would she have dreamed that . vithout reversing the king's command, . which God was utilizing to bring his . nfaithful people to their knees, God could so wondrously make an exception in her favor, and make it a royal command to her to nurse that very son, who by Pharaoh's command was doomed to death! So wondrous are the ways of God!

"And the child grew" (verse 10); God had so ordered it that Moses' first impressions should not be made in the midst of the life of the court of Pharaoh, but among his afflicted people, and in a home-life where the fear of the Lord prevailed. But the same faith which had enabled his parents to commit him to God by the riverside must now commit him to God in a heathen court; his mother brought him to Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. His royal foster mother spared no pains or money on his education; he was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. What must have been the prayer rising from the house of Amram for this son, whose education would all be on heathen lines! And what must have been the watchful care of God, in answer to those prayers, which could keep him sheltered in such an atmosphere, so fatal to the spiritual life!

Weiser's Gift to China

Rev. Henry G. Taylor, of St. Luke's, Weiser, Idaho, writes:

I send you draft for famine fund, $11.47, which kindly add to the $136.85 sent by the mayor, and regard the total as Weiser's contribution—$148.32. The $11.47 and $9.39 of the larger sum were contributed by the children of the public schools of our little city, a total of $20.86 from the boys and girls.

This excellent showing for a town of 3,500 population indicates how warmly the cause of China appeals to the hearts and sympathies of American communities. Weiser's gift may be blessed to the saving of many lives in the famine land.

MORE BOXES OF GOLD

And Many Greenbacks

325 boxes of Gold and Greenbacks will be sent to persons who write the most interesting and truthful letters of experience on the following topics:

1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum.

2. Give name and account of one or more coffee drinkers who have been hurt by it and have been induced to quit and use Postum.

3. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?

4. Did you set such a person right regarding the easy way to make it clear, black, and with a snappy, rich taste?

5. Have you ever found a better way to make it than to use four heaping teaspoonfuls to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, and beginning at that time when actual boiling starts, boil full 15 minutes more to extract the flavor and food value. (A piece of butter the size of a pea will prevent boiling over.) This contest is confined to those who have used Postum prior to the date of this advertisement.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Contest will close June 1st, 1907, and no letters received after that date will be admitted. Examinations of letters will be made by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd. Their decisions will be fair and final, and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five writers of the most interesting letters, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best, a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to each of the 200 next best, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the little boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause, and costs the competitors absolutely nothing.

Address your letter to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Reasons for eating more Quaker Oats

YOU and your children eat Quaker Oats, Quaker Rice and Quaker Wheat Berries because you like them; they agree with you and are satisfying and easily digested.

Good enough reasons for eating them.

But most people don't eat enough of these foods.

The greatest strength and endurance come from eating pure cereal foods such as those made by The Quaker Oats Company.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley

Chief of the National Government Chemistry Bureau

in a report to a National Committee at Washington, D.C., says:

"The opinion that particular foods nourish particular parts of the body is quite erroneous. 'Nerve and brain foods' are advertised, but they are all nonsense. I think we eat too much meat for health. The cereal-eating nations of the world can endure more physical toil than the meat-eating nations. You cannot tire out a Japanese, who eats rice. He will draw you all around town on a pound of rice and be as fresh at the close of the day as when he started. You could not do that on a pound of meat to save your life."

Prof. Fisher of Yale University in a report on the result of the most exhaustive tests on the subject, says:

"The experiments furnished a severe test to the claims of the flesh abstainers. The result would indicate that non-flesh eaters have far greater endurance than those accustomed to the ordinary American diet."

The advice of these men should be followed: Eat more cereals, and be sure that you eat the best if you expect to get the best results.

There is one safe guide in buying any cereal food; ask for and insist on getting goods made by The Quaker Oats Company; you can be sure that they are clean and pure.

Quaker Oats Quality means perfection.

Questions and Answers

C. S. N., Savannah, Ga. Where is Wellesley College, by whom was it founded, and is it for women alone or both sexes? Is it denominational?

Wellesley College is located in the village of Wellesley, Mass., fifteen miles southwest of Boston. It is devoted entirely to the higher education of women. It is non-sectarian, and was founded in 1872 by Henry F. Durant, a brilliant and successful lawyer, who, upon the death of his only son, converted his magnificent country-seat into a college. The campus includes 300 acres of great natural beauty.

R. W. S. How do the Hudson River tunnel builders strengthen the tube's foundation? How do they drive piles after the tube is in place?

The tunnels have been put through soft mud. There is a steel shell that is reinforced by concrete. After the tube or tunnel is completed, the piles are driven down into the hard-pan, which is found often at a great distance below the tube. The piles used are called "screw piles" and are not at all like the piles ordinarily used in construction work. The screw piles are made in short sections. At short intervals in the tunnel are left holes the size of the screw pile; the piles are inserted in these holes and forced down; one section is screwed upon another until the pile can be driven no further; the last section is then made secure to the bottom or floor of the steel tube. Hundreds of these steel piles are used, so that a cross section of tunnel construction would make the tube have the appearance of standing on steel legs.

S. E. F., Santa Ana, Calif. 1. Will the MAIL-BAG tell me who composed the hymn "Nearer, my God, to Thee"? Was the writer a Unitarian? 2. When and how was Unitarianism started?

1. The hymn was written by Mrs. Sarah Flower Adams, who was a Unitarian. 2. In the second century the unity of God was taught by a sect called the "Monarchians." It may be said to have existed from the earliest days of the Christian church. In Luther's time it had appeared in nearly all the European countries. The first Unitarian Association in America was organized in 1825.

Apropos of the friendly rivalry over the leading record for long-continued service as Sunday School superintendent, Mr. A. S. Riland, of Cressona, Pa., writes:

In May, 1854, I was living on a farm five miles from any Sunday School. I organized a Sunday School in a room over a spring house on my farm and was elected superintendent. I went to a saw mill, got some slabs made benches for seats, and commenced school. In a year's time the school got too large for the room. We moved our school one mile to the public school; we continued there for three years, then moved east three miles, two miles west of Friedensburg, Pa. Was elected superintendent of a Sunday School of a Lutheran and German Reformed Church and I superintended that school for two years. Then we built a church in Friedensburg, Pa. (Union Protestant), in 1859. I was elected superintendent, and they have elected me annually ever since. I have now been fifty-four years superintendent, four years in Swatara Valley, two years at St. John's Church, and forty-eight years at Friedensburg Church. Wife is seventy-nine, I am in my eighty-third year. I missed but one Sunday at school this year, and that was to attend a Sunday School rally at Pottsville, Pa.

Our friend's record is certainly a remarkable one and we should be glad to hear of others like it.

E. W. H., Reading, Pa. Why is Pennsylvania called the Keystone State?

It is so called because it was the middle or seventh in geographical position of the original thirteen States.

H. R. D., Wolfboro Falls, N. H. Was John Randolph ever a member of the United States Senate? He boasted of being a descendant of Pocahontas and so had Indian blood in his veins, if the seventh in line could possess such.

John Randolph of Roanoke was elected to Congress in 1799, and re-elected in 1814. He was a descendant of Pocahontas. There are a number of prominent families in America and in England who are also descended from her and are very proud of the fact. Any one who is descended from her, no matter how many generations away, would have Indian blood in his veins.

E. F. R., Tecumseh, Kan. Has any one ever ascended Mount Everest, in the Himalayas? If not, in what way has its height been computed?

According to Nelson's Encyclopedia, no one has ever been able to reach the top on account of the numerous sharp peaks that surround it. It is not necessary to climb a mountain in order to ascertain its height. The elevation can be computed by trigonometry.

Unveiling the McClellan Statue in Washington

WASHINGTON is rapidly becoming one of the most beautiful capitals in the world, and her display of artistic memorials to the great men of our national history will compare favorably with those erected by citizens of more ancient countries to their honored dead. Recently a fine statue of General George B. McClellan was unveiled in Washington in the presence of President Roosevelt, General McClellan's widow and many of the soldiers who served with him in his campaigns.

It is not generally known that polygamy prevails among the native tribes in Liberia. Mrs. Mary L. Allen, of Sinoe, writes from Nanakroo:

Please thank the readers of your paper for their kindness to my work. I have some little native girls in my mission now, a thing impossible in times past. The people sell the girls for wives, some of the men having as high as thirty wives. Bullocks, wives and slaves constitute a man's wealth here. I am sure the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will readily understand how much I appreciate any effort on their part to give the light of the Gospel to these poor sin-blinded people.

A Georgia reader sends us this note:

The saloon men of Bainbridge, Ga., closed their places of business one week before the election "to show that the town would be ruined (?) without saloons." The people liked a "dry" town so well that the majority for prohibition was greater than the entire vote for whisky. The saloon men doubtless see their mistake now.

Evangelists, churches, Sunday Schools, mission chapels and others' interested in revivals and spiritual work generally, can procure copies of the revival hymn "Get Right with God" (words and music) from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at the rate of ten cents per hundred. It is now sung everywhere, and is one of the most effective Gospel songs that have yet appeared, being readily sung by any audience. Address CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Ex-Organist Thomas A. Linton, of London, writes:

It is often asked why musicians object to congregational singing. The objections are these: Men who do not sing tenor or bass parts sing an octave below the melody, and those with deep bass voices drop down two octaves where the melody ascends too high for their voices. But no one has ever heard a congregation singing in time," not to speak of "in tune," excepting haps, at the Torry and Alexander meetings, w Mr. Alexander succeeds to a great exte keeping the voices "in time" by his vigorous exceptional mode of conducting. It is prove that a congregation drags about half a beat, a result which is painfully discordant.

WE had a hunt of man-eating tigers here lately, n I am sending you e photographs, h will show your ers the kind of es one encounters urma. They repnt some of the reu of a hunting trip n by my nephew, M Herbert Vinton, three young Engnen and a Karen her in the school which my nephew charge. It is a ly Karen school numbers over four lred pupils, mostly ders, from wee up to young men l maidens nearly of their teens.

esides the two esses shown in the tographs, more ards, deer and l pigs than I can remember fell to their guns, bes eight alligators. I suppose the party are now in same section of country. A man-eating tiger has n terrifying the people of that district, so they sent ny nephew to beg him to rid them of the brute.

am working single-handed still at the mission, but ect Mr. Tornblad back next week. It is now nearly months since I heard or spoke a word of English, l I am quite ready to hear it again.

This week, not a day has gone by without heathen oing in, to whom the Gospel has been preached. One n from Kawlay came to beg that I would give him a ct like one I had given him before. That one blew wn from the shelf where he kept it and his little ld tore it up. "I was so sorry," he explained; "I s reading it. Ma-ma, have u not got one more just e that one?" I feel sure it this man is genuinely erested.

Another man, over fifty ars of age, belonging on Gyan, says that he is ing to become a Christian. very innocently said that wanted my help in a land tter, and he was going to a Christian, because we ssionaries stood by our ople when they were opessed and wronged. He ll have my help in his case, cause I believe he is being onged; and he will also be ught, so far as I can do what it is to be a true ristian.

Yesterday I was able to re a man for general work. e is a Talaing, but speaks rmese well. He separated om his wife eight years go, and she has married gain, but he has not. He s one son fifteen years old, nother boy of about ten, one arried daughter, and one aughter about twelve years. e comes to family worship orning and evening, and I ke his behavior so far.

It is a co fort to know that our cotton is being picked at last. The children have done what they could, but most of the bushes are from eight feet to fourteen feet tall, and they can only reach the lower branches and pick up what falls to the ground. I have been too ill the last three weeks to venture on the work myself, and have devoted my time to ginning instead, working most days from early morning of one day till 1 A.M. of the next.

The Lord has sent me $10 from a friend in New York, which will buy thatch for the three native houses and an addition to this one I live in, and pay for its transport here besides. Another gift also came and with it I have paid this new man's wages for one week, bought a small supply of dried salt fish, paid for a fresh supply of stamps and left a little for daily needs. Our store of rice is fast melting away, and daily the prayer is offered at morning and evening worship, before the children and heathen visitors, that the Lord will send money for more rice, for paddy, and for the taxes, which are now due. Often our oldest girl says, "I know God will send the money, Ma-ma."

Regular support would be an immense relief to me. It seems as if in all America there ought to be enough good people to keep this work going until it becomes self-supporting, which it will do if we can only have this help. The government has given me seventy-five rupees for a supply of wool and cotton seed, and the order has gone to Queensland for it; but where is the money to pay for the clearing of more land? I can only beg the "Father of the fatherless" to lead his children to send the needed help.

A heathen man came in just now. He is nearly sixty years of age. His elder brother and all his family have been converted and baptized recently. I have had one talk with this man before; now he tells me that he has often heard the Gospel from the Talaing pastor at K'mahwet, and that he had promised him to become a Christian, but he had been busy and had let the matter wait. I urged for an immediate decision, and after reading him different portions of God's Word, we knelt together and I prayed for him, and then he repeated a few words of prayer after me. I said, "Now you have asked the eternal God to receive and save you; there must be no more worshiping of devils, idols, and priests." His reply was, "Ma-ma, no one can ride on two boats." He has promised to pray morning and evening every day, and to abstain from work on Sunday and come to meeting. I believe the man is sincere. He tells me that he has already told his son that he intends "to enter the eternal God's side," and that his son simply says, "Do whatever you think to be right."

I am glad that I am here, cut off though I am from society and civilization. It is something to be thankful for, with all one's heart, to be where one can make known the love of Christ to those who otherwise would not hear of Christ and his salvation. Over and over, this morning, Ko Bwin said to me, "Ma-ma, it is only as we can hear that we can believe." Oh, if Christians at home would only take

"Christocentric"

TEXT: GALATIANS 2:20

"I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live"

NO man would seriously wish to be crucified, and deliberately take his place with the companions of the Sorrowful Way, if he could serve God and his generation by treading the primrose path below. Yet all men and women everywhere would ardently long to be crucified, that they might live again, yet not they, but Christ living in them, were they but endowed with the piercing vision, swift imagination, and power to distinguish between appearance and reality which should make plain before the choice its infinite sweet bliss.

Witnesses of the Christ-Life

The great saints of the Christian Church, they who have been great sinners and great sufferers, and have lived to serve God greatly, have told us of the pain and bliss of dying to their old sinning selves and rising to walk in newness of life. Their mystic words seem all too high for us, too fine for human nature's daily food. The ecstasies of Tauler or St. Teresa, of Samuel Rutherford or St. Francis or Thomas a Kempis, look out from the printed page and bewilder us. They even irritate us, when they do not leave us quite cold from their touch, yet they are but individual representations of Paul's experience set forth in this great text: "I have been crucified with Christ. And yet I live! Yet, indeed, it is not I; it is Christ who lives in me!" This experience the apostle relates in a hundred different ways, but always in terms which seem to us of colder blood and critical temperament terms of hyperbole. His sentences are magnificent. They shine above us like the stars, or blaze upon our path as the burning noon. "Christ in us the hope of glory." "I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me." "To live is Christ; to die is gain." "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creation"—not "any other creature;" this is no sublime et cetera—"nor a new creation, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Wherefore, "In everything give thanks!" "Rejoice! And again I say unto you, Rejoice!"

A question rises in every thoughtful mind: this exquisite bliss is not ours; why is it not? What are the characteristics of the twentieth century which forbid to its children the raptures of the first? The question answers itself as soon as it takes form in our thoughts. It is not the age which makes the difference; for these saints of God, with Pauline passion, joy, and fervor, have lived and fed the high traditions of the race in every generation of the world's history since the day of mighty rushing wind and tongues of flame. What is there, then, in ourselves which makes us critical of the fervor, blind to the magic, and deaf to the music? O men and women of these modern days, children of the unresting energies of our century, our bliss is not so real and splendid because our crucifixion has not been so complete! These great rhapsodists were great sufferers. They heard the Spirit's insistent cry: "Die, and come to life again; for until thou dost, thou art but a troubled guest upon an earth of gloom." So they died, and each declares, "Now we live indeed; and yet not I; it is Christ who lives in me."

The Reward of Love

This is the compensation and the exceeding great reward. Christ will be no man's debtor. Good measure, pressed down and running over, will he pour into the bosom when the heart has yielded itself to him with no reserves nor secret fears. Who is so poor to-day that he—or more probably she—cannot call to mind the wonder and the glory of a love which longed to surrender all and merge itself, selfish and content, in the overshadowing love of one whose love was life itself? In those entrancing hours there is no will, no volition, no self-directing, self-commanding mind. Self is no longer self. Identity does not exist. Personality is no more. The senses are alive, but the nerves cease to quiver with the rapture of living, and over the soul steals the sweet sleep of a dreamless bliss.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning understood this well. Very woman of very women, she knew it on its deepest human side. She projected her knowledge into the infinite, and realized it by the power of her own immeasurable love. "Bertha in the Lane" has made the last and dearest sacrifice of all; she has given up love for love's sake, and now she is dying. With her last breath she cries—

> Jesus, Victim, comprehending
> Love's divine self-abnegation,
> Cleanse my love in its self-spending
> And absorb the poor libation!
> Wind my thread of life up higher;
> Up, through angels' hands of fire!
> I aspire while I expire.

So Paul felt. The strong man was mastered, and, strange to say, was in love with the sense of surrender. Ruskin conceived of nothing better or happier in free-will than he would have found in unhesitating obedience to a stronger personality which was guaranteed to him unfailingly wise and incorruptibly pure. Paul attained to a joy higher and deeper, broader and more permanent than this. He lived! He lived with every drop of blood in his veins, with every beat of his untamed heart, with every output of his inexhaustible courage. He lived—to dare; to soar; to aspire; to confront baffling foes, convert hostile mobs, blast with his withering scorn a perjured priest, wake in his judge's breast the stifled longing for better things, wrest the thought of philosophers from dead systems to the living God, set flame to the drooping moral energies of slave and thief in the slums of Rome while himself shaking the throne of the Cæsars! He lived—to bridge roaring seas, tunnel mountain barriers between race and race, and so impress himself upon the institutions of the ancient world as to dominate the policies and shape the destinies of mankind until this hour!

The Indwelling Christ

But through all this he felt, in some mysterious yet unmistakable way, that it was not he that lived at all, and not he who did any of these things. It was another Will that had taken possession of Paul's will; it was another Personality that had subjugated his own. And instead of humiliation in the thought of such subjection there was dignity, there was greatness, there was a new sense of power. High privilege was his. There was glory in his soul. This was life at last! And all that he had known or dreamed before was but the feeblest adumbration of this life of throbbing purpose and consecrated manhood. Was the other man Paul, that man of the past? And was that cramped life his? Nay, but this is Paul, and now he truly lives—yet not he, but Christ, who lives in him!

This is the secret of heroic living amongst men. Hugh Price Hughes once said that the theology of the past was Hellocentric. It started from the idea of hell as the central conception of the religious life. Conversion began in a desire to flee from the wrath to come. But the theology of to-day is CHRISTOCENTRIC. From Christ it starts, and to the whole circumference of definition, deduction, and dogma it concerns itself with what was in the mind of Christ; for to the Christian, God must mean what God meant to the consciousness of Christ. Let it mean less than that, and it may be new theology or old, good theology or bad, but it is not Christian.

Theology is a small matter compared to religion. Yet in this case what is true of the less is immeasurably more true of the great. Our life, to the extremity of each tiniest nerve, if we are to be Christians mighty in word and work, must tingle with Christocentric force. He is the fount and origin of all our supernatural power—power to walk this earth with resounding tread while yet we lift our daring eyes to greet the smiling heavens. To understand something about Him—this is good, and this is the province of theology. To explain and enforce what we know—this is better, and this is the genius of the preacher.

Christ in the Heart

But to carry Christ in the heart, though the highest we know is that we know little about him, though the experience by which we live defies analysis and will not so much as abide our questioning, yet to carry Christ in the heart, and from his indwelling derive favor with God and power with man—this is best of all. This is the privilege of all his people, and the end of our fellowship, our worship, our preaching and praying, is a life in which every emotion, ambition, and passion is Christocentric.

The secret of heroic living? Indeed it is. Moved and controlled by this energy divine, Christianity, age by age, has won its conquering way. In what name, O martyr in thy shirt of fire, dost thou try conclusions with the gods and the legions, the wild b the torture-chamber, and the headsman's sword o perial Rome? In what name, O follower of the rene, darest thou to stand before philosophers judges, poets and satirists, councils and kings, an pose the foolishness of preaching to the wisdo the world? In what name, apostle, hero, refo missionary, herald of Christ where Satan's se calling manhood, womanhood, childhood, from and corruption into loveliness of life again, an of the pollution of cities' depths and cities' sin ca flowers and fruits to grow—O miracle-worker o days, in what name and by what power doest such things as these? And the answer comes lips that tremble yet with the weight of their H nas, "Unto Him that loved us and loosed us fro sins by his blood, and made us kings and priests his God and Father, unto him be glory and dom for ever and for ever!"

The True Centre

Christocentric! Does the word sound eccen And does the thing intended seem eccentric? An you one who will consider Christocentricity an if a nobler, form of eccentricity, or perhaps not noble, but merely foolish in the end?

Well, you know the meaning of the words you else you would not use them! What does "eccen mean? The dictionary says, "Not having the centre as another." And is that all? For that is these men move with a motion which is not from as the centre of their universe. It is Christ who in them.

"Eccentricity" is no fixed and determinate qu It is relative to the position of the person who it eccentricity. Who told you that you are so wiser than your neighbor that it may be taken thing of course that your centre is the true ce and motion from any other is "eccentric"? Ma can only be defined when we have first establish standard of rationality. One Christocentric soul through life and went to his martyr death decla that either Christianity justified the utmost degre enthusiasm or it justified no regard at all, and himself he was willing to count all things and lif self but loss for Africa and Christ. Doubtless was mad. But then, what is sanity?

I should not expect you to reckon the late Q Victoria amongst the idealists, the visionaries, the spired fanatics of our race. But in the "Life Archbishop Benson" a strange and deep thing recorded of her. "As I get older," she said, "I ca understand this world. I cannot comprehend its li ness. When I look at the frivolities and littlenesse people, it seems to me as if they were all a little m my whole life so felt the presence and power of the Holy Spirit as on that occasion.

One man was from Pahyah, a village eight miles south from Lootshan. A native Christian had stayed at his house and given him tracts and he had begged for the New Testament and got it. "Ma-ma," he said, "I have read it night and day, and now there are several of us living at Pahyah, planning to build a chapel-schoolhouse and to send for a Christian teacher." It did do my heart good to hear that.

How glad and grateful your note of January 8 and its money enclosure made me, you can imagine when I tell you that my treasury had got down to just six cents. On New Year's morning I was up as usual at about 4.30 A.M., and after I had got my kitchen fire going and kettles on, I went out under the stars and cried to God in utter distress. Mr. Tornblad had had one attack of fever after another, till he was very run down. No money had come; our supplies of food were exhausted; we had been weeks without tea, sugar, milk or flour; rice was giving out, and what we were to do, I did not know. I asked the Lord to send immediate help. That day came a New Year's box from my dear sister—tea, sugar, milk, biscuits, canned mutton, beef, bovril, butter (we had not tasted butter for months), cocoa, etc. But before all these good things came, while out there under the stars, the answer had come to me clear and distinct, "Have faith in God."

I then told Mr. Tornblad that God had given me the assurance that he had heard and would help. Next came a bill of exchange for $25, mailed from New York October 3, but carelessly dropped from my mail on its way from Ankai. The letter had been picked up, the envelope opened and the bill of exchange taken by a native and the letter destroyed. The bill was kept because the man did not quite dare to dispose of it. It was found upon him and restored to me about January 15.

I have just written to the bankers who issued the bill to find out who sent it, as I have no clue. It may have been one of your readers. I paid off some bills which had been troubling me much, and bought myself a pair of shoes, for mine were too ragged to be kept on my feet. I feel to take fresh courage and push on with renewed hope, and expect great things more from the Lord.

Again thanking you and your readers for your kind remembrance of this work, I remain, etc.,

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I wish to thank you for your splendid effort in raising and sending such a large amount of money and supplies to the poor stricken people of China; also for your noble efforts in years gone by in behalf of the stricken children of India. Surely, you and your readers will have your reward, for our King hath said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

I wish you abundant success in your philanthropic efforts in behalf of the needy both at home and abroad.

It is well with me. I'll have a little more rough tossing on the billows' foam—a few more days of earthly darkness, and then the sunshine of the Father's throne, when I shall see him face to face, and tell the story: "Saved by grace."

With kindest regards, I remain, yours till the day dawns and the shadows flee away, IRA D. SANKEY.

iterate, millionaire or son of the soil, he will "shake he gates of hell and set up the kingdom of God on arth." He will care little for your maxims of selfegarding prudence. Do you think you will move him rom his course by calling him eccentric? I advise you o crowd the stars out of their orbits and the sun out f the heavens!

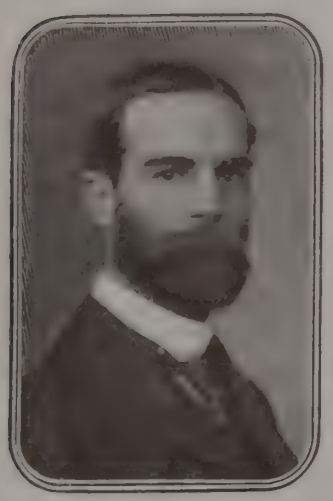
Is there such a man here, burning with zeal and love? Or woman, raised up as prophetess of the Most High and setting herself against the conventional falsehoods of our civilization? Or young man, eager-hearted, longing to match himself against the powers that hold the world in thrall? Well, then, my brother or my sister dear, my comrade and my friend, be true to the instinct of your soul, and pay no heed to careful people who have not yet learned what it is to live. They do not understand you. But the spirits of just men made perfect, the goodly fellowship of the prophets, the glorious company of the apostles, the noble army of martyrs, they understand you. And seeing we are compassed about by so great a cloud of witnesses, seeing that we touch their hands, that our lips pronounce their vows, that we are inspired by the same faith, sustained by the same hope, and filled with the same love—aye, and are owned and guided and blessed and shall be crowned by the same Christ—let us keep the fires burning, and see if by and by they will not sweep away all drowsy and decorous selfishness in their consuming flames.

Alas for those of us who think ourselves wise, and must one day beat upon our breasts as foolish men and lost! Do thou baptize us with fire, O our God! Baptize us with the love that burned in the souls of thy martyrs when they died for thee, and in the heart of thy Son! His fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly cleanse his threshing-floor; but he will gather the wheat into his garner. The chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire. O God, we pray for that.

> Wake, wake me, Lord: arouse me! Let thy fire
> Loosen these icicles, and make them drop
> And flow into warm tears. For I aspire
> To hold thee faster, warmer, dearer, nigher,
> And love and serve thee henceforth without stop.

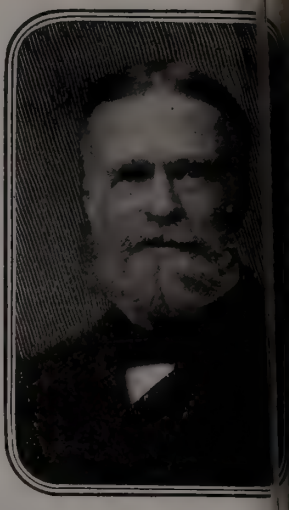
Let the fire of the Holy Spirit descend! These falsities and follies, the artificialities, conventions, fears, that make us poor and all our actions small, this "chaff" upon the Lord's threshing-floor, may it be burned up, not in the fires of thine anger, but in our own glowing love for thee, blazing, eternal, God-like, for our God, our loving God, our Father-God, our God is a consuming fire!

"BAPTISTS' DAY" AT JAMESTOWN



E. Y. Mullins, D.D., Louisville, Ky.

The Auditorium and Palace of History



O. P. Gifford, D.D., Buffalo, N

MAY 23 will be "Baptist Day" at the Jamestown Exposition, and the indications are that the attendance will be a record-breaker for the Baptists. The General Convention of the Baptists of North America will meet in Convention Hall of the Jamestown Exposition on Wednesday afternoon, May 22, closing Thursday night, May 23.

In 1845 the Northern and Southern Baptists decided to have their own separate Conventions. But since the Civil War, they have been rapidly coming together, and three years ago, in St. Louis, the Baptists of the North and the South had a remarkable Jubilee Union Convention, which was marked by wonderful enthusiasm and good fellowship. At this St. Louis meeting and love-feast, it was decided to form a permanent organization, to include all the Baptists of North America. So this meeting at Jamestown, Va., on May 22 and 23 is the second Convention since 1845, when the Baptists of the North and the South meet together.

Besides these two great wings of the denomination, there will be delegates and visitors representing the Baptists of Nova Scotia, Manitoba, British Columbia and other provinces of Canada. As the railroads make a low rate, it is anticipated that the attendance will be very large.

The address of welcome will be delivered by ex-Governor Montague of Virginia, and the president's address by Hon. E. W. Stephens of Missouri; after which leading representatives of missionary organizations will speak on noteworthy events in their several fields. Dr. John E. White, of Atlanta, and Dr. O. P. Gifford, of Buffalo, will discuss the timely question: "To What Extent May a Christian Denomination Engage in the Correction of Public Evils?" Dr. W. J. Williamson, of St. Louis, will speak upon a "Related System of Baptist Summer Assemblies"; Dr. E. E. Chivers, of New York, upon "The Significance of the Recent Development of Missionary Interest Among our Young People;" and Dr. E. Y. Mullins, of Louisville, Ky., upon "The Contributions of Baptists to American Civilization." Special matters that are likely to engage the attention of the Convention are: The Meeting of the Baptist World Alliance in 1910, Church Federation, the Baptist Brotherhood, a National Christian Temperance Movement, Arbitration, etc.

Virginia is historic ground for the Baptists. The first Baptist church in that State was organized in Isle of Wight County in 1714, on the south side of the river and opposite Jamestown. As Virginia was settled by Cavaliers from England in 1607, who were loyal to the Church of England, and so transplanted the State Church of England to Virginia, it was to be expected, from the sentiments of that day, that nonconformists would be persecuted. These persecutions were especially bitter against the Baptists and Quakers. "Baptist ministers in Virginia, in the early days, were fined, pelted, beaten, imprisoned, poisoned, and hunted with dogs; their congregations were assaulted and dispersed; the solemn ordinance of baptism was rudely interrupted, both administrators and candidates being plunged and held beneath the water till nearly dead; they suffered mock trials, and even in courts of justice were subjected to indignities not unlike those inflicted by the infamous Jeffreys." So writes Taylor the historian. About thirty ministers were put in prison, some of them several times, "but by preaching Jesus through the gates and on the high walls, many were brought to Christ." Crowds gathered around the prisons at Fredericksburg, in the counties of Kings and Queens, Culpeper, Middlesex, Essex, Orange and Caroline, to hear these imprisoned Baptist ministers preach through the windows and bars. The Baptists of the North and the South propose to celebrate the deeds of these heroes of the faith whose blood stained the soil of Virginia in the early days, because they preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

All of the general boards and societies of the Baptists, North and South, have arranged to meet and sit together representatively in the Roger Williams Memorial Baptist Exhibit Building during the Jamestown Exposition. This Baptist Memorial Building will be an educational feature, and many leaders will tell the visitors of the trials and triumphs of Baptists, and what the fathers endured in persecutions and sufferings for the cause of liberty on this hemisphere. There will be exhibits of documents, parchments, books, busts, pictures, maps and relics, including bolts, bars and prison locks, behind which Baptists suffered as in the day of the apostles and martyrs. The portrait gallery of Baptist leaders, from Bunyan to Broadus, will be an inspiring roll-call.

But the Baptists of Virginia have made magnificent progress since the early days of persecution. There are in the State now 1,009 Baptist churches, and 283 white Baptists. There are also 1,439 c churches, with a membership of 247,173, mak total Baptist membership in the State of 378,456 f Baptists. The church property of the white Ba has a value of about three million dollars. A years ago the Baptists of Richmond outnumbere membership of all the other denominations put toge It would seem that persecution is a good thing fo growth of any church or denomination.

It is rumored that the Southern Baptists are to down from their anniversary at Richmond se thousand strong. The Southern Baptists are fu spiritual enthusiasm and aggressiveness. They great and splendid churches and colleges, and theological seminary at Louisville, Ky., has the la attendance of students for the ministry of any l estant theological seminary in the world. The So ern Baptists are very evangelical and evangelistic, they have witnessed remarkable revivals in re years. The Baptists are very strong and aggressi the South. Texas has 382,000 Baptists, of which ber 219,000 are white. North Carolina has 344 Baptists, of which 190,000 are white. Kentucky nearly 300,000 Baptists, of which over 200,000 are wh

Some of the Baptists of the North will go to the C vention on special trains. There will be a spe Chicago train, as that city is a great Baptist cen Boston usually has a New England train, as it is a strong Baptist centre. Philadelphia and New Y will send large delegations. California and the Pa Coast will be represented, especially as Los Ang desires the Northern anniversary to meet in that next year. The Baptist building at Jamestown wil a permanent building, and will be called "The Ro Williams Memorial Church," for it is expected that Exposition site will become a great town. The No ern Baptists are to have one side of this building the Southern Baptists the other side for their resp tive exhibits. Entertaining Jamestown's Visitors

Y the time this strikes the eye of the reader, the Jamestown Exposition will be practically in running order. Some unfortunate criticism has been made of the condition of the grounds and ings and the lack of exhibits on the opening day, 26. The day first set for the opening was May 13, he time was put forward, in order to the ceremony on the anniversary of rst landing three hundred years ago. matter of fact, none of our great sitions or those held abroad have complete within several weeks after lay when the gates were first thrown .

erything, declares the Commissioner- eral, will be at its best in June, and ore delightful time could be chosen a trip to Norfolk and this typically rican Exposition. Those who went e opening and during the first weeks enough to repay them, though it was to what will be on view during the mer and fall. The people who came Norfolk from all the States of the on enjoyed seeing what their com- iots were like, and then they turned r attention to the official visitors. bably for a generation the country has seen such a gathering of gold-laced ials. The grand stand at the time of sident Roosevelt's address and at the r of the review was all aglitter. The sian Ambassador probably attracted most attention. His long coat was ered with bands of gold braid, and oss his chest was a string of insignia of various orders of knighthood of which is a member. On his head he wore a ked hat or chapeau, surmounted by a plume of thers. It would be difficult to give a full and accu- e account of this remarkable headdress in cold type. e reader is referred to the picture on this page of the fficers and Diplomats," in which the hat appears.

The day after the officials went back to Washington, the officers and men on the warships began to get acquainted. The puffy little launches were on the go from morning to night as the officers visited about. A visit of an officer of one ship to the commander of another is a very dignified and noisy affair.

When the launch comes alongside, the guns boom out the salute due the rank of the visitor; sailors stand at attention on either side of the ladder, and a commissioned officer receives the guest. The call is short and as the visitor goes over the side the guns bang out again. The higher the rank of the visitor the greater the number of explosions. If he is a full admiral, the ordinary landsman gets the impression that the crew is trying to blow up the ship.

The "jackies" of the American warships were told to entertain the seamen of the foreign warship nearest them. Right royally it was done. The men of each ship were given $200 to provide for the dinner, and the men all contributed liberally when their committee passed their caps.

The visitors came early in the evening and remained as long as the regulations would allow. Those who came from the British ships were perfectly at home the moment they came aboard. Those who came from the German and other foreign vessels where English is not down in the drill regulations tried sign language. Good music and a big dinner made up for the absence of speeches of the "hands across the sea" order.

An entertainment followed the banquent. As the foreign crews dropped over the side into their boats and launches, they cheered the United States and its sailormen until their voices were husky. Some of the warships that were at the opening will leave soon, but their places will be taken by others, so that all visitors will have an opportunity of seeing a good-sized fleet. The Japanese squadron could not get here in time for the opening, but it is now at Norfolk under the command of Admiral Ijuin, who distinguished himself during the late war with Russia.

Members of the Diplomatic Corps and American Officers

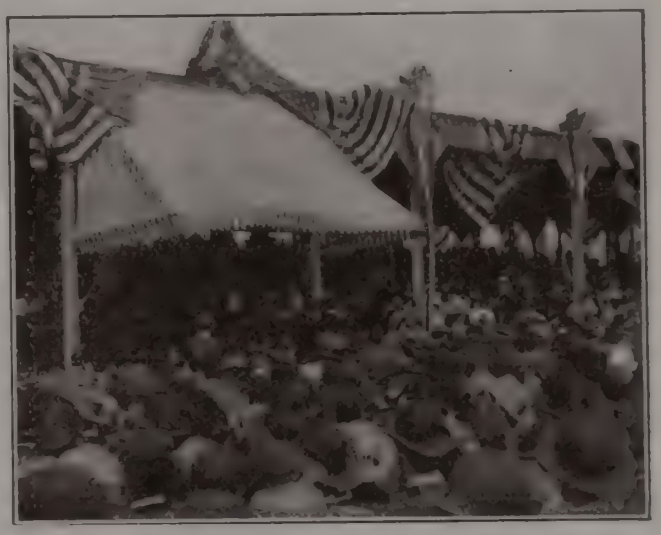
On the Exposition grounds the government exhibits were the first in place, and now those of all the States are ready for inspection. The government has two large buildings for its exhibits and two smaller structures on either side to hold collections from the Smithsonian Institution and the Department of Fisheries. There is also a delegation of sixty Filipinos who will have a replica of their native village and show the visitors how these new wards of the nation live.

The amusement part of the Exposition was the last to get into working order on account of labor conditions at Norfolk, but even here there is more than enough to help the visitor to pass a pleasant hour or two and give him an opportunity to leave some of the money he had put aside for his vacation at the Exposition.

The Exposition Guard that is now on duty on the grounds is called the Powhatan Guard, in honor of Chief Powhatan, the father of Pocahontas. The guardsmen are all former soldiers of the American Army. Some are mounted. All wear an attractive uniform of gray and red. They number one hundred and seventy-five, and are under the command of a regular officer of marines. If Powhatan himself could return in the flesh he would find that the red man had not disappeared, for the American Indian will be much in evidence. There will be a large camp under the command of White Eagle, of the Poncas, and Chief Big Wolf.

People From Every State Going to the Review

President Roosevelt Speaking on Opening Day



IN THE PUBLIC EYE

SWITZERLAND, although one of the oldest republics, and holding an honored place among the nations, has such a quiet existence, set as it is among impregnable mountains, that few people, aside from students, ever have their attention called to her political affairs. She has now a new president, Col. Edward Muller. He is in reality president of the council, and has far less authority than has our own president, or even that of France. The term of office is but one year, so that no important policy can be planned and carried out by one man. Switzerland's form of government is somewhat primitive for the twentieth century, and there are signs that indicate discontent by some of the people with its clumsy referendum. No country can make all of its people into statesmen.

THE MEMBERS of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, in Brooklyn, are arranging to place a bronze tablet in the church in honor of Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, who became its pastor in 1860, and who, though retired from active work, still takes great interest in all that affects his parish. Dr. Cuyler has not confined himself to the pulpit, but has written over four thousand articles for leading religious papers. The list of his published books is a long one. He is interested in all moral reforms, especially temperance, and in philanthropic enterprises. The honor of being immortalized in bronze, while yet in life, is given to but few. Men of all beliefs in this case, however, are satisfied that the tribute is well deserved.

REGIS HENRI POST has been appointed governor of the island of Puerto Rico by President Roosevelt. He is one of the youngest of insular officials, as he is but thirty-seven. He graduated from Harvard in 1891, and later from the law department of the University of New York. He took an early interest in politics and was a member of the New York State Assembly in 1899-1900. Two years later he became auditor of Puerto Rico, and in 1904 secretary of the island. Gov. Winthrop, who retires, made a fine record.

Pastoral Temptations

IT is always a sad thing to see a congregation torn by internal dissensions, or threatened with disruption through the deviation of some of its members from the path of rectitude. Sadder still is it when this unhappy condition has been precipitated by the moral lapses of one who, as shepherd of the flock, should have led them in ways of purity, peace and uprightness. When such a misfortune does occur in a congregation, and the pastor is overtaken in a fault, it is generally found, on investigation, that the pew is, to some extent at least, contributory to the disaster.

There are few more serious stumbling-blocks to a pastor than an unspiritual, cold, rich, selfish and indifferent element in his congregation. Only a miracle of grace can reach the hearts of such people. In such a parish, and with such unideal and discouraging surroundings, the pastor finds the wall of indifference that stands between him and his people virtually unscalable. His ministry becomes a mere perfunctory office; his spiritual influence is reduced to a cipher. And if, after a vain struggle, he yields and, taking the color of his surroundings, becomes a worldling like the rest, he is repudiated by the very class he thought to serve. It is a recognized though an unwritten law that a preacher, down, is out and disgraced beyond rehabilitation.

But while society rightly demands a higher standard of conduct and a more scrupulous integrity from the pulpit than from the pew, the latter has duties and responsibilities not to be overlooked. Preaching recently on the case of a dishonored pastor on Long Island, Bishop Burgess of the Episcopal Church, a clear-headed and just prelate, laid down the rule that "as the church is, so is the pastor." If the congregation be earnest and enthusiastic, the minister will be stimulated to his best work. If, on the other hand, it be a congregation tolerant of the gilded vices of those who live in the pomp of luxury and silken ease, and who are contemptuous of the old-fashioned virtues, there can be no spiritual uplift in that church. Millionaire parishioners who have so little respect for their pastor that they make him a common, cheap, ministerial drudge, and expect him to uphold the dignity of his office in a phenomenally rich church on a paltry salary, which puts social equality at least out of the question, are themselves living on the low level of spiritual paupers.

While we would not extenuate in the smallest degree the disloyalty of any one who has fallen from the high estate of spiritual leadership in a church through yielding to temptation, we would commend to congregations generally the moral of Bishop Burgess' remarks, which is that, to a very large extent, your minister will be what you make him. Treat him with brotherly friendship and cordial liberality; let him be as one of yourselves—a social equal and not a menial; strengthen him with your sympathy; help him to meet his own troubles half-way at least. And when his hour of temptation comes—as come it does to all men—your love and helpfulness will succor and uphold him and bear him safely through the crisis. Remember that the pastor may need saving as well as the church. See that you do your part, that the reproach of failure may not lie at your door.

Missionary Substitutes

OUR "missionary substitute" plan, which we explained at the beginning of the new year, has already received substantial commendation and support from our readers all over the Union. That the idea of individual representation on the foreign field, with personal communication assured between the patron and the native substitute, will afford a long-coveted opportunity to many earnest Christians at home, is amply proven by the letters which have been received, cordially endorsing the plan and the opening for effective service it offers.

There are many good men and women, who themselves, at some period of their lives, have heard a clear and insistent call to help carry the Gospel to the heathen whom Christ died to save. Many circumstances which they could not control combined to prevent a personal response; but ever after, a lack has been felt in the spiritual life, and the uneasy sense of an obligation repudiated. To such as these the missionary substitute plan appeals with special intensity.

Sunday School classes, too, are finding the personal substitute plan a satisfactory answer to the question of how they shall best get in close touch with foreign work. A letter from Montana reads: "My Sunday School girls and I decided last Sabbath to assume the support of a native worker in Africa. Enclosed find check," etc.

The good hand of God is ever laid in benediction upon his people in their efforts toward the evangelization of the world. Numerous are the methods employed whereby the glorious day when "every knee shall bow" may be hastened in its coming; but we doubt if any strikes a more responsive chord in the hearts of Christian workers at home than the "personal substitute" plan.

The Disadvantages of Wealth

OUR public teachers in the press and on the platform appear to be somewhat overdoing the work of denouncing the millionaire, especially the millionaire who attends church and desires to be known as a Christian. That he has his faults none will deny; that the senseless adulation of him, because he is rich, has in many instances given him an exaggerated idea of his own importance is admitted; but he is entitled to fair treatment. He does not appear to be having this in some of the articles now appearing in the press, nor in some of the recent utterances on the public platform. The rich man should not be denounced simply for being rich, unless it can be proved that he has gained his wealth by improper means. In many instances he has adopted the very methods that his critics have adopted, and has succeeded when they failed, because he was more adroit or had better facilities than they. It is right, too, to censure him if he is selfish, or miserly, or is vulgarly ostentatious; but those are qualities of which he has no monopoly. The envious jibes and sneers often uttered in referring to him are indications that his censors, if suddenly endowed with prosperity, would behave as he does. The rich man, like the poor man, ought to be esteemed or despised according to his personal character, apart from his wealth or lack of it.

Our Lord's rule is too often forgotten in dealing with men of great wealth. He bade us "Judge not that ye be not judged." We may have our own idea of what the millionaire ought to do, but we have no right to impose our standard of conduct upon him. We naturally wonder that he should be indifferent to the want and misery around him, and that he should give his attention to making his fortune larger, rather than to trying to find some way of alleviating the suffering of others; but for this he will be called to account by One whose judgment is infallible, and the responsibility is his, not ours. Our concern is rather to see that our own resources are rightly applied, and we are encouraged to that duty by the estimate Christ placed on the widow's gift of her two mites. The approval of God is the prize for which all, rich and poor alike, should aim; and we know, by the remark Christ made on that occasion, that we have a better opportunity than the rich man of gaining that approval. We may make a gift that costs us self-denial, while there are some millionaires who could not do that, however much they gave.

After all has been said of the pleasure and happiness of the millionaire, there are aspects of his position that may excite our pity. It cannot be pleasant for him to know that his fellow-citizens in so large numbers envy him and often hate him with such malignity. He must often feel hurt that his benefactions are made the subject of sneers, and that even when he tries to do good, his motives are misjudged. Besides all this, he must be conscious of the danger his wealth involves to his own personal spiritual state. None knows better than he how hard it is for the rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. Tempted on all sides, having the means of gratifying his evil propensities, flattered by servile admirers, cajoled by fawning schemers, it must often be hard for him to keep near to God. And he knows that in the end that nearness will be the crucial test of his eternal happiness.

Let us therefore not join the unthinking throng who denounce the rich, whether they deserve it or not. Rather let us examine our own conduct and be thankful that no greater responsibility is laid upon us. Every one has need to utter Agur's prayer: "Give me neither poverty nor riches: feed me with food convenient for me."

NEWLY DISCOVERED RELICS OF THE ANCIENT INCAS OF PERU

Relics of the Incas

MANY ancient relics of South American civilization have recently been acquired by the Museum of Natural History in New York. They are believed to belong to the period of the Incas, if not to a still earlier civilization. It is now clearly established that the Incas were themselves conquerors and that they adopted many of the customs of the aboriginal inhabitants. There are indications in the temples and ruined buildings of the struggle for supremacy between the earlier and later civilizations and of a period when there was a commingling of both. In the absence of written records, these articles of gold and silver, stone and wood, are being closely studied in the hope of discovering the various stages of civilization of those prehistoric times. The uses of some of the articles are a complete mystery, while others may be guessed at, and a few are obvious. The ladies' ornaments and the articles of domestic use are easily identified; and the vases and jars, some of which are exquisite, are indications of the increasing skill and artistic taste of the people. The greater part of the collection came from the tombs, or chulpas, as they were called. Like other ancient races, the Incas put in the graves of their dead such articles as the departed used in life, and might be supposed to need should they have another life. In the tomb of a man believed to be a fisherman were found fishing-lines of various sizes, some copper hooks and copper sinkers. Upon the body of a woman, doubtless his wife, buried in the same chamber, was a delicate comb and in her hand a fan made of the feathers of parrots and humming-birds, and having a cane handle. Two children in the same tomb had their toys buried with them. Between the lips in each case was a circular piece of metal, doubtless a coin, probably designed to pay some ghostly attendant for some service to the dead or for admission to the Inca paradise. The bodies were not embalmed, but had gone through some process of desiccation which had preserved them. The Inca civilization had attained its highest point when Columbus landed, so that these articles must be seven centuries old or more. It is a curious and fascinating study, that of trying to discover the character of an extinct race with no other clue than the mute articles they placed in the tombs of their dead. Their decking them with ornaments and leaving money with them shows that they found it difficult as some of us do to realize that in the future life riches are of no avail.

A great ransom cannot deliver thee. Will he esteem thy riches? No, not gold nor all the forces of strength. (Job 36: 18, 19.)

Birth of a Prince

Spain was gratified on May 10 by the announcement of the birth of an heir to the throne. The English princess, niece of King Edward, who became the wife of King Alfonso of Spain, gave birth to a son and the city of Madrid was apprised of the fact by the booming of cannon. In the palace the premier and the dignitaries of State awaited the new arrival in an anteroom, and when the nurse brought in the babe lying on a crimson velvet cushion, on a great silver salver, the premier carried it around the room that the nobles and high court officers might gaze upon it. This custom, which would naturally shock the Queen as an intrusion on her privacy, is necessary in Spain, where the nobles and people are suspicious of a changeling being foisted upon them. The customary salute of twenty-one guns was fired, notifying the people of the capital of the beginning of a national holiday. The event means more to the Spanish people than to citizens of other countries, owing to the fact that the pretenders to the throne would menace the national peace if there was any failure of a legitimate successor to Alfonso. Congratulations from all lands are pouring in to the royal pair. Not the least cordial will be those they receive from this country, which in spite of the recent unpleasantness has hearty good will to Spain, and has more respect for her since it has learned by experience the difficulties of the problem that she had to solve in governing her distant colonies. It may be hoped that the good wishes will be fulfilled, and that the infant prince may grow up to be a wise and prudent ruler of his country.

Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son. (Psalm 72: 1.)

A Deserted Ship

A three-masted ship laden with oil came into New York harbor a few days ago after a series of adventures. She left New York on March 3 bound for Calcutta. Two days later she encountered heavy weather, which grew worse from day to day until it blew a fierce gale. The sails were torn away and one of the masts was broken. The crippled ship limped slowly to Bermuda, where she was repaired. She was even then in no condition to proceed on so long a voyage as to Calcutta, and it was determined to take her back to New York. On the way she broke down again, and the assistance of a tug was obtained to bring her to port. Again rough weather was met and the tug and the vessel were blown out of their course. The tug, fearing for her own safety, abandoned the ship, which was thus left to battle with the waves alone. The captain of the ship spread his sails as well as he could, and, aided by another tug, succeeded in reaching New York in safety. In the meantime the first tug had been searching for her, and finally, thinking she had foundered, came to port only to find the ship safe in dock, though she had lost the credit of bringing her in. Sometimes Christians setting out to rescue sinners similarly lose patience when the work becomes difficult. That is always unwise; it is by faith and patience that the prize is won.

Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. (Rev. 3: 11.)

An Ex-Empress Sued

A curious suit has been commenced against the ex-Empress Eugenie, widow of Napoleon III., Emperor of the French. It is brought by a M. Thierry, who claims $800,000 for money loaned to the Emperor, with interest upon it for fifty-two years. The ex-Empress, now eighty-one years of age, is enjoying the beauties of Nice, and her husband's creditor has availed himself of the opportunity to enter the suit in the French courts. His story of the transaction is that in July, 1855, the Emperor borrowed $600,000 from a wealthy shipping agent at Nantes, the uncle of the present suitor. He promised to pay the amount with interest in July, 1870. Before that time the lender was dead, leaving his claim as a legacy to his nephew. The nephew presented the note, but the Emperor was then beginning his war with Prussia and was in no condition to pay the bill. He asked for an extension of time and finally Napoleon signed a new note to mature in 1885 for $800,000. M. Thierry in some way lost the note during the troubles that followed the Prussian invasion, and could not present it at maturity. He found it recently, and now brings suit to compel the aged widow to pay her husband's debt.

It will be easy for the Empress to pay the claim, if the courts decide that she must, as she is very rich. But the bringing of the suit at this late day must have astonished her. It would be a disagreeable reminder of the splendor and the prodigality of the period of her glory. Doubtless, if she ever knew of the transaction, she would not suppose the claim would be revived after so long a slumber. That is an error to which all are prone. Men are apt to think that what they have forgotten is obliterated. Many will be surprised when the time comes of which the preacher spoke, when the books of judgment are opened and they learn that:

God requireth that which is past. (Eccles. 3: 15.)

In Peril in Death Valley

A press dispatch from Los Angeles, Calif., says that a party of mining men from New York State had a narrow escape recently from death in the burning sands of the region that has earned the name of "Death Valley." They hired horses in Goldfield and set out to explore the country around Willow. Their objective point was Willow Creek, but they wandered far from the right trail. As they did not return to friends they had left at Greenwater, a message inquiring for them was sent to Willow. Two men of that town volunteered to go in search of the missing men. They made their way to the top of a peak 6,000 feet high, and with glasses saw the party at the bottom of a deep gorge, six miles away. The searchers finally reached them and found three men delirious from thirst and heat. The others were trying to make a horse climb a nearly perpendicular wall of rock. They gave them water from their canteens, and with great difficulty led them from the gorge. The New Yorkers were finally brought back to their senses. They said they remembered climbing the same peak, and had seen from its summit what they had thought was a clear river. The river proved to be a mirage. How many of the wanderers in the lands of sin are similarly deceived! Their thirst for happiness is tantalized by the mirage that ever fails them. Happy are they when He finds them who can satisfy them.

Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst. (John 4: 14.)

Delusions of the Insane

The evidence given at the trial of a notorious murderer in New York recently, being likely to raise questions regarding insanity, one of the most famous specialists has been interviewed on the symptoms of the affliction. He said that, as a general definition, it may be said that "insanity implies a brain defect which shows itself in discordant language or conduct. The causes of insanity may be hereditary taint, or the strain on the brain or nervous system due to grief, worry, disappointed love, fright, shock, injuries, excesses, poison, drugs or alcohol. Alcohol is one of the most prolific causes of insanity, for it causes about twenty per cent. of all cases. There is much in the life of to-day which contributes to insanity, for now the human brain is undergoing a strain which it was never intended that it should meet. The tear and rush of modern life have a strong influence in permanently disturbing the mental equilibrium. Among the symptoms of insanity usually given are slowness and difficulty in thought processes, peculiar restlessness, and fixed delusions. It would, however, be a mistake to regard delusions as a certain proof of insanity. There are many men attending to large businesses to-day who have delusions." To this opinion we may add that we are not justified in considering a man insane, even though he gives the most striking proof of foolishness that a man can give, by having the delusion so common here and in other lands that material possessions can give durable happiness.

What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? (Mark 8: 36.)

"THE MASTER CALLETH FOR THEE"

International Sunday School Lesson for June 2, 1907

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

MOSES had eighty years of preparation for the forty years of work he was now called to undertake. Three years at his mother's knee so attached Moses to Israel's God that thirty-seven subsequent years of teaching by the white-robed priests of idolatry could not turn him aside. It was probably at forty that he "refused" to be proclaimed heir to the throne. He "chose to endure affliction with the people of God rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, having regard to the recompense of reward; for he endured as seeing him who is invisible." Probably it was at this period that he championed his oppressed countrymen. Alas, he found, as so many deliverers have done, that enslaved people sometimes have no strong aspirations to be free. Forty years more of hardship must intervene before his enslaved countrymen would be willing to leave the flesh-pots of Egypt and endure the wilderness in order to enjoy liberty and independence in Canaan.

Meantime, in the daily toil of a shepherd, he must himself learn to be the shepherd of Israel. As Jesus made carpentry a divine trade, and healing a divine profession, so Joseph, and Moses, and David show us how the farmer's cattle-raising may be glorified by courage and courtesy. The story is worth repeating of the class in a London public school who were asked "What sort of a man was Moses?" One answered, "He was meek." Another answered, "He was brave." Yet another said, "He was a gentleman." "What makes you think so," asked the teacher. "Because," said the boy, "when the shepherds crowded back the shepherdesses at the watering troughs, Moses said, 'Ladies first, gentlemen.'" It was a happy reminder that a workman may be a gentleman. Indeed, the word gentleman comes to us through him who was a carpenter in Nazareth, who afterwards taught that gentle consideration for others is the mark of nobility. Most of the Old Testament leaders were herdsmen; most of the New Testament leaders were fishermen.

Humble Instruments

It should not be overlooked that while God called some from trades to preach, he called others to serve him by staying in their trades. Indeed the "callings" include the trades. Men who despise their handiwork, or think of it as only a means to make money, rather than a true ministry to God and man, need to read anew the divine call to Bezaleel, the mechanic, who was later a helper of Moses. "See, I have called by name Bezaleel, and I have filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom and in understanding, to work in gold and in silver and in brass and in cutting of stones, and in carving of wood to work in all manner of workmanship" (Ex. 31: 2-5). A traveler standing outside of Cologne Cathedral expressed his admiration of its beauty. "Yes," said a laborer standing near, "it is a fine building, and took us many a year to finish." "What did you have to do with it?" asked the tourist. "I mixed the mortar," was the modest yet proud reply. God had called Moses to serve him and the world for forty years as a shepherd, and the hour was at hand when his flock was to be a great nation.

The Glory in the Bush

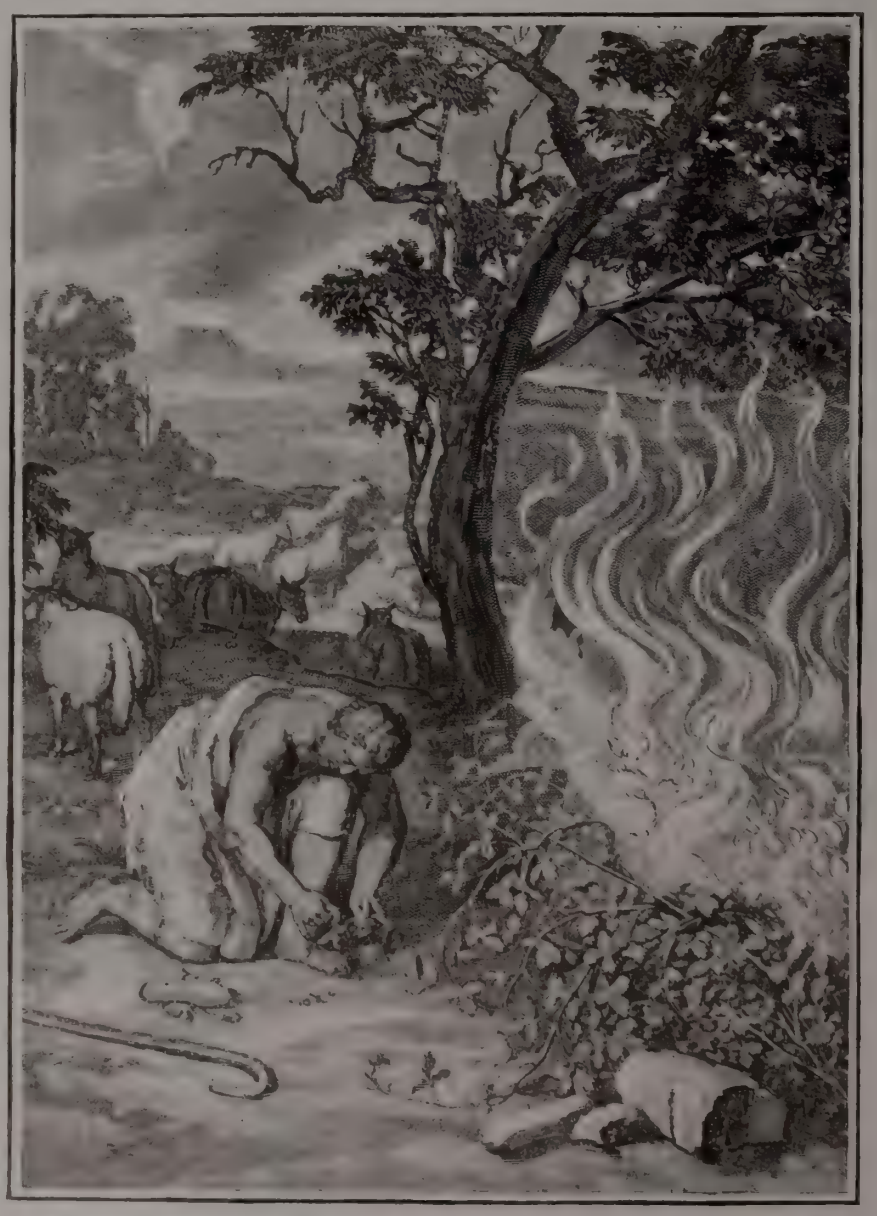
The hour for which Moses had come into the world was that in which God summoned him from tending his flocks in the region of Mount Sinai to lead Israel from bondage in Egypt to Canaan, the promised land. God waved a flaming torch, the burning bush, to attract his attention. Moses hastened to investigate why the bush that seemed to burn was not consumed. What seemed to be fire was not fire, but rather the Shekinah light which afterward shone between the cherubim in the tabernacle, and which in the fiery pillar led Israel all their journey through. As Moses came near to the burning bush, he heard a voice from the midst of the fire, calling him by name, "Moses, Moses." And Moses could but answer, "Here am I." The voice said, "Come not nearer; put off thy shoes, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground."

Moses hid his face in the folds of his shepherd cloak, as later, on Mount Sinai, Moses' own face shone with the reflected light of God, so that he had to wear a veil over his face that the people might safely look upon him.

There is splendor enough in the lowliest weed and the simplest flower and in the tiniest grass-blade to fill our hearts with awe, if we but have eyes to see. It is just this difference of seeing and not seeing that makes the world so dull and common to one person and so bright and radiant to another. We ought to pray much to have our eyes opened, for then we should behold beauty and glory and God everywhere. Mrs. Browning writes:

> Earth's crammed with heaven,
> And every common bush afire with God;
> But only he who sees takes off his shoes:
> The others sit round it, and pluck blackberries.

At the burning bush, God talked with Moses "as a man talketh with his friend." God there gave to Moses his great commission: "I will send thee unto Pharaoh that thou mayest bring forth my people, the children of Israel, out of Egypt." Moses, instead of rejoicing to be sent upon such an errand by the Lord God Almighty, trembled and said, "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh?" Then God promised him the strongest reinforcements, even his own presence: "Certainly I will be with thee." And furthermore God said, "When you have brought the people out, I will meet them upon this mountain." Moses' long hesitation in the presence of God's command because of undue self-consciousness, when he should have accepted God's biddings as enablings, reminds us of two illustrations:



"Put off thy shoes, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground"

Obedience and Politeness

A man who had been cross-eyed all his life, after undergoing an operation was completely restored to normal vision. "Why," said he, "for the first time in my life I can really see. Before this I was looking at myself all the time." An English courtier, when directed by his king to enter a carriage first, said, "No, sire—after your majesty." A French courtier, with a similar direction, immediately entered. "That," said the French king, is true obedien Only a few can have eloquence wealth, or fame, but all can have gre things than any of these gifts, the gr of faith and obedience. Still Moses tered, saying, "But the people will ha believe that God sent me. What shall I say to the And God replied, "Say that I Am has sent you, and will know by this that you have come in the nam the true and living God." And then God entered the details of the campaign: how he would put forth hand to overcome Egypt; how he would bring Israel with abundance of treasure for their needs; and other enemies should be overcome that they might c into full possession of the promised land.

The Faltering Prophet

Moses still hesitated, even with God on his side, asked of God a sign which would confirm his wo And God gave him two signs—turning his rod int serpent, and back again into a rod; then covering hand with leprosy, and making it well again; both which God gave him power to do in the presence Pharaoh. Why did not Moses remember the great tr that Mrs. Browning has so well pressed:

> And I smiled to think God's greatness > flowed around our incompleteness,
> Round our restlessness his rest.

Still Moses faltered, and pleaded w God that he was not eloquent, could not properly express the dema that Pharaoh should let Israel go. was not enough that God promis to be with his mouth. What won that the anger of the Lord was kind against Moses? Yet God consent that the brother of Moses, Aar should become the spokesman. M cifully God did not withdraw the co mission of Moses, but held him to great work to which he had called hi

> No smiting of the sea—no tears
> Ecstatic, shed on Sinai's steep—
> No Nebo with a God to keep > His burial! Only forty years
> Of desert watching with his sheep.

God's Calls

There are two strong Bible paralle to the call of Moses from the burni bush. One of these is the call Isaiah (sixth chapter), who hears t voice of God from the blazing glo of the heavens, saying: "Whom sh I send and who will go for us Isaiah, like Moses, felt his unfitness the blaze of divine purity, and e claimed, "Woe is me, for I am a m of unclean lips." But when those li had been purged by the live coals fro off the altar, "Isaiah said, "Lord, he am I, send me."

Another close parallel to Mose call was that of Saul of Tarsus, who the gate of Damascus suddenly b held in the sky the glorious form the risen Christ standing sentin over the little church he had com to destroy, and heard the divine ca to become a missionary of the cros There was a great struggle in h soul, but he "was not disobedient t the heavenly vision."

> To be a thing as sacred and august
> As some white altar where the angels knee
> We need the faith to walk a path untroc
> The power to be alone and work with Goc

> EDWIN MARKHAM.

Not miraculously like Moses, Isaiah and Paul are mos of us called, but more like Peter, James and John, t whom Jesus said only, "Follow me." The calls o several of them came through other Christians, Peter through Andrew, Nathanael's through Philip, as our call to service mostly come through parent or pastor. Durin a season of revival, a man was praying one evening fo an unconverted neighbor that he might be "touched wit the finger of God." Something seemed to say, "Thou art the finger of God; hast thou ever touched thy neigh bor? Hast thou ever in all these years spoken to him o God?" He arose from his knees to bear to him the cal of God.

When Samuel Rutherford, the Scotch divine, was lying on his death-bed, they told him he would have a summons and be executed at a certain time. He said, "I have another summons, and before the Scotch summons reaches here I shall be where few great men and kings come."

The "Buford" Setting Out from San Francisco on Her Voyage of Rescue to Starving China

Photographed specially for The Christian Herald, by J. D. Givens

Our Famine Ship on the Ocean

THE PICTORIAL STORY OF THE TRANSPORT "BUFORD'S" SAILING FROM THE GOLDEN GATE TO CHINA, ON HER MISSION OF MERCY

NOW that the gallant steamer Buford is well on her voyage, the principal scenes attendant upon her loading and departure from San Francisco are photographically presented in s issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These illustra- ns vividly recall similar scenes on the occasion when r first relief ship, the Leo, sailed from New York for ssia, and afterward when the Quito and the Everett t these shores for India. Each of these occasions s of more than national significance. They marked e growth of that spirit of world-wide benevolence and r-reaching humanity, hich has become more aracteristic of America an of any other country the globe.

Although the principal cts connected with the uford's departure have ready been printed in ese pages, the following tter from Mr. E. R. ohnstone, who goes to hina on the transport as HE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S presentative, will be read ith more than usual inter- t, as he was a participant the scenes he describes. He wrote on the eve of iling:

"I have seen hats doffed nd dainty kerchiefs waved salute to the ship and er mission, for these peo- le of San Francisco know hat calamity means; ap- reciate what it is to be old and hungry, homeless nd destitute; know, too, ow blessed is the succor of he sympathizing, and how astly a great need aug- ents the value of gifts of the necessaries of life.

"A word or two about the ship that bears in her hold fe-saving nutriment for hundreds of thousands of hu- an beings in that far-off kingdom that in this time of ress is far from 'flowery,' either as to appearance or entiment. The Buford was built at Belfast for the tlantic Transport line of steamers, and as the Missouri he was well known in New York and London, between hich world-capitals she long plied, bearing passengers, ails and freight. Bought by the United States government and renamed, this time after one of the most gallant Federal cavalry leaders of our Civil War, the Buford was early put to service in the war department, to carry troops, supplies and munitions of war between San Francisco, Hawaii, and the Philippines.

"Stanchly built of steel, schooner-rigged, well engined and with adequate boiler power, the ship can carry, in addition to coal enough to suffice for the full transpacific run, more than a thousand troops and a full complement of officers and crew. She is not a fast vessel, in the acceptation obtaining on the Atlantic littoral, but could log seventeen knots under pressure, and with moderate coal consumption can traverse 2,000 leagues or more of ocean at twelve knots per hour. This is above the average of cruising speed for vessels of the world's regular navies, and is fast enough for all usual purposes.

"The single funnel bears the broad red, white and blue bands of the army transport service, and at bow and stern are several wicked-looking quick-firers—generally used, however, for saluting purposes only, but fully able to give a good accounting, were pirates encountered down Formosa way or in the turgid waters of the Yellow Sea. There are men behind the guns, too, if need should arise for the protection of the thousands upon thousands of bags of flour safely stored below the main deck, with its 400 feet of length and forty of beam.

"The hull gleams white with that spick-and-span effect that made Uncle Sam's ships so noteworthy in Oyster Bay and Hampton Roads. Clasping the stern is the blue-and-white-barred shield we know as Columbia's coat of arms. Bright as muscle and loving care of sailormen can make it, shines the steel of deck-fittings, and with the Union Jack at the fore, the Stars and Stripes at the stern, the army burgee at the main and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pennant at the fore topmast, the ship makes gallant show, appearing, as she is, fit to bear life to the thousands in the far-off Orient.

"What of the life-saving cargo itself? This product of thousands of acres of grain-fields, far apart as Minnesota and Oregon, Kansas and Saskatchewan, has been stored with scrupulous care, by men skilled in their trade, and each sack bears a message of that 'greatest of all, which is charity,' and tells of the unselfishness, the generous-mindedness and the effective giving of hosts of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

"Not an easy task, this gathering of those thousands of tons of flour to this far-off port. How the railway and army officials watched the making-up, the dispatching, the progress, haps and mishaps of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD train that, starting from Minneapolis, nearly 2,500 miles away, was rushed through on passenger time, crossing the lake country of Minnesota, the plains of Nebraska, the swelling foothills of Colorado and Wyoming, the ridge of the Rockies in Utah, the desolate alkaline flats of Nevada and the great canyons and spurs of the Sierras to Pacific tide-water at Sacramento, and its haven on the edge of the Golden Gate!

"There were unavoidable delays; delays from derailment, from landslides, from high water, from traffic congestion and, once, from overspeed, when the wind lifted the roofs of three of the cars bodily and landed them beside the track. But none of the mishaps was vital and the two officials detailed by the Southern Pacific to give the train their especial ward and guidance (two aside, of course, from the regular crew of engineers, firemen, conductors, brakemen, flagmen and yardmen) had reason to be proud of successful attainment. They deserve the thanks of the donors of the food and one may feel sure they shall have them in full measure.

"Major Krauthoff and Captain Symonds of the Commissary Department, U. S. Army, were simply indefatigable at this end of the line. There were 2,000 tons of Pacific coast flour to be purchased here and hereabouts at the lowest possible rates, rigidly inspected and tested by trained army bakers, sacked and marked, transported from Port Costa, thirty miles north of San Francisco, weighed out on the dock and loaded. It is to be remembered that all this executive work was purely a labor of love, and superadded to duties that are by no means simple or few. I know that these officers breathed more freely when they could report 'Flour purchased, inspected, loaded, paid for,' and to them, too, is due the highest praise and heartiest thanks.

"It is delightful to note the appreciation felt here, by civilians as well as by soldiers and sailors, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers' gifts and of the spirit that prompted them. Over and over again I have been asked: 'How was it done? How was such interest excited and such generosity evoked for Chinese sufferers so far away?' There are always ready listeners here (and many of them wear the insignia of considerable rank) for stories of the spirit of abnegation and deprivation such as were shown by thousands of those who made the Buford's cargo possible. A general officer of the U. S. Army said to me: 'Sir, it's the brotherhood of man made manifest and it appeals to me more than all the poetry or essays written or planned. It is practical Christianity in very truth and will have more influence on the minds of the Orientals than you can possibly imagine. It is splendid, sir, and I salute THE CHRISTIAN HERALD flag with all honor and respect.' E. R. JOHNSTONE."

All China Awaits the Buford

Reports from the famine field by mail and cable state that the two Relief Committees are making extensive preparations in anticipation of the Buford's arrival. The coming of this great cargo of flour necessitates a more complete organization of the relief work along the Great Canal. One report estimates that in that section alone 200,000 families can be immediately relieved and helped till the end of the famine, which will be when the next harvest is ready. This means approximately the saving of nearly one million lives along the Grand Canal. Consul-General Rodgers is to pass upon the plans the two Committees are now preparing for the distribution of the cargo. Not one pound of flour will go amiss. It is generally regarded as a settled thing that the Buford's arrival, followed shortly afterward by that of the transport Logan, which carries the balance of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers' great gift to China, will mark the turning point of the famine.

Writing from Chinkiang, March 29, Secretary McCrea of the Missionary Committee says:

It is going to be a big problem properly to transport and distribute this food (the Buford's cargo), but we are all going to do the best we can. Fortunately, it will not arrive until the Centennial Conference at Shanghai, and we will make an appeal there for a large number of missionaries to aid us in the distribution. Our Committee is in correspondence with Consul-General Rodgers and Mr. Little about the transporting of this food from Chinkiang to the famine area. We estimate that it will take two hundred and fifty Chinese cargo boats and forty or more launches or tugs to carry the cargo up the canal. So you see the wonderful generosity of our American people is giving us a rather interesting proposition to work out. But the experience we are now getting in sending up the food supplies of the Shanghai Committee will aid us in handling the much larger amount you are sending.

It is true, of course, that the people who are receiving our help have improved in condition. But generous as our people have been we are only able to reach a small proportion of the sufferers. The letters I am enclosing will show you the conditions of the mass of the people whom our work has not reached. There is hope for improved conditions until after the harvest in June but there will be none even then for many, from the present out

Rev. Wm. P. Chalfant, Shwang Kpu (90 li, ... miles east of Hsuchowfu) writes:

The workers are giving out condensed milk in small quantities.

"As to how many are dying," adds the writer, "any estimate would be a mere guess. But in our district we have already found a number of houses where there were dead. The men seem to die more rapidly than the women. We have quite a number of widows on our free list. Sickness is decidedly on the increase. There is a good deal of smallpox and other sickness. Malarial fever is common. We have commenced giving out quinine. One woman died at our relief station gate Monday morning. The worst thing I have seen is dead bodies eaten by dogs. Mr. Rice found the body of a woman Saturday, with a couple of dogs eating it. Then we have seen several skulls being eaten or dragged about by dogs."

President Wheeler of California University, Speaking

Rev. Dr. J. B. Woods writes: "The conditions are terrible. From all over the country we have word of people dying in hamlets, sometimes nearly all of a family perishing. Roots, bark, tobacco stalks, even tables and chairs made out of elm wood, are sawed up, reduced to powder, mixed with greens and eaten. It is particularly sad to see the men pulling down their houses, selling the timbers to buy food, and using the thatch for fuel, sheltering themselves under a few pieces of matting, and with only mud walls to mark the site of their homes. Robbery is rife, but is kept from being more prevalent than it is because there is so little to steal. Travelers are relieved of their horses and donkeys, which are killed and eaten by the famine-stricken. Children are being sold, people at the door begging for purchasers of their little ones at any price. The sights one sees and the sounds he hears are harrowing. It is impossible to estimate the number of people dying, but thousands are perishing, especially the weak and the children. The officials have stopped our helping the refugees outside the city, fearing a multitude will come. It is hard to be quiet at such times."

Rev. James Ware, one of the missionaries in Shanghai, gives this account of a visit on relief duty to Sunkiaweitze, which lies to the north of Tingkiatse:

Home after home which we visited contained whole families on the verge of starvation. Many had already died, one-half of the people had changed color, and in every home nothing was to be seen in the food-baskets but the bark of trees and sweet potato vines. As we entered the homes, the elder people would fall down and kowtow to us; and many were too weak to rise without assistance. Many people being at the point of death, literally living skeletons, we sent immediately for six tins of sea biscuits to distribute among the most urgent cases until we could receive the flour.

I gave out 457 tickets, covering the support of 915 children, 1,651 adults, and providing daily 1,749 catties of flour, an average of not quite three-quarters of a catty per head. Each case was personally investigated, and only the destitute received relief. It was a never-to-be-forgotten sight to see these people, with the shadow of death upon them, receiving their flour for the first time. As it was poured into their baskets, their faces would undergo a change, which can best be expressed by the phrase, "from death to life."

Refugees and dogs would compete for the grains of flour that would be spilt around the depots. A woman with a baby a few days old walked many miles to beg a sea biscuit. Two children had died the night before and had been laid out in the common to be devoured by the semi-wild dogs of the plains. A dead man was lying by the wayside, his face covered over with his cap. A woman and two children were trying to get their husband and father to speak to them; he had just died on the road. Fathers being too weak to push a load of flour, would be assisted by their wives and children, towing with a rope. Father, mother and five little ones could be seen, the children ranging from eleven to infancy, all in rags and huddled together in a circle trying to keep warm and starving to death. In every other house smallpox or fever, and nothing to eat but bark of trees and potato vines. The hardest thing of all was to see children out of whose hungry eyes one's own children seemed to be looking, watching wistfully as others were being relieved.

In a little book entitled The Silent War, just issued by the North China Daily News of Shanghai, Mr. Walter Kirton, a correspondent, relates the result of a very thorough personal investigation of famine conditions. He more than confirms all the statements issued by the relief committees and by individual missionaries as to the tragic sufferings and desperate condition of the people in the famine provinces. He believes that the Chinese authorities have tried in good faith to check the famine and relieve the suffering, and that many of the minor officials have done sincere and earnest work. As to the relief committees, both civic and missionary, Mr. Kirton gives their work unstinted approval. "It is impossible, however," he writes, "to feed all the starving people. In all probability at least a million human beings will die within the next six months—unless a miracle happens." It should be explained that at the time when Mr. Kirton wrote the relief movement had not attained its present dimensions, and was confined to a comparatively restricted area. Now, it is operative in almost all the affected districts, and points lately regarded as beyond the reach of practical help are now being assisted. Who shall say that this wonderful broadening of the relief movement (which has now over 600,000 names on its lists, representing probably five times that number of actual dependents), with the tremendous impetus it will receive when the food-ships Buford and Logan arrive, may not be the means ordained to avert the greater calamity and save the people who were regarded as beyond help?

Mr. Kirton found most of the officials and gentry courteous, earnest, and actuated by the best of motives in their efforts to help the suffering. It was the general opinion among them that the proper course was for the authorities to furnish employment and thus give relief in its most acceptable form; but owing to lack of funds this could not be done. In his travels he encountered no anti-foreign hostility; in fact, he adds, "the demeanor of the people of Kiangpeh (beyond a very natural curiosity) would not discredit the highest forms of civilization." This happy attitude toward foreigners is in a great measure due to the action of the missionaries, whom he found to be men "worthy of the great calling to which they belong. The influence of these men, who sacrified many—and in some cases all—of the amenities of civilized existence for the purpose of carrying on their work amongst a people who will inevitably b enormously thereby, is a credit not only to them and the organizations to which they belong, but t Western ideal which China must ultimately absorb would make herself worthy and safe in the fam the nations.

Christendom's Sympathy with China

Will China Become Christian?

IN a remarkable communication published in The North China Mail, of recent date, the writer quotes as follows from Dr. Timothy Richard, the famous missionary, in an address delivered in Peking in December last:

"Three years ago, in Shantung, I assisted at a conference of Chinese officials and religious leaders with a number of Christian missionaries. They had come together to consider the adoption of a new religion for the Chinese people. The Governor and over thirty mandarins were present. The successor of Confucius in the seventy-fifth generation was also present and expressed a sympathetic interest in the great inquiry. Buddhism and Taoism were likewise represented. Deep earnestness conjoined with a spirit of conciliation marked the proceedings; and at the end the Governor (now Viceroy in Canton) asked for many copies of the New Testament, which he said he would distribute with his own hands among his mandarins—to ensure the reading of them.

"Three years ago a missionary in Peking (I do not say it was myself) called on the Ministers of the Board of Foreign Affairs. He asked them if Peking had been taken by non Christian Powers, would they have willingly retired? They answered 'No.' 'Did you drive them out?' was the next question. To that they replied in the same way, and when the missionary assured them that their retirement and the reinstatement of the fugitive Emperor was in obedience to moral principle resting on the law of God, they appeared to be deeply impressed, and they seemed almost ready to assent when he proposed that China should signalize those events by ranging herself alongside of the Christian Powers of Europe and America.

"At the present hour, the aspect of things is still more encouraging. We see idolatry dying out in the light of a new education. We see reforms of the most sweeping character succeeding each other with a rapidity that takes our breath away. Would we be surprised to see a decree one of these days proclaiming Christianity as the religion of the Chinese Empire?"

The "Buford"

ON, on, thou noble ship, nor pause
Mid islands of the sea,
As rescued bird for its hungering brood,
So let thy passage be.

Furl not thy sails till thou hast gained
Poor starving China's shore,
And tell her where thy sacks were filled
The garner running o'er.

Remember that thy errand now
Across the mighty deep,
Is not to pile the groaning board
For pampered lords to eat.

But starving millions o'er the seas
Watch for thy precious freight,
Oh, God forbid that one poor soul
Should find the gift too late.

Fill, fill her sails, ye tardy winds,
Let not a zephyr waste;
She's missioned for a starving land
Her voyage must be in haste.

Thou gracious God, who hold'st the sea
In thine almighty hand,
Should tempest rise, stretch forth thine arm
And speak that great command.

Oh bless the gift, convey it safe,
And sanctify its use
Whether 'tis poured from plenty's horn
Or drained from widow's cruse.

A Little Worker's Offering to China

When nine-year-old Arthur Irving Robinson, of Harlingen, New Jersey, first heard THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S appeal for starving China read by his mother, he asked permission to see what he could raise among the townspeople for the relief of the sufferers. "Call me early in the morning, mamma," said he, and each morning before school the sturdy little legs trotted from door to door, and he told the sad story. Finally the day came when he had gathered $11 to send to the Famine Relief Fund, with the message, "I hope it may be a blessing to them." Is it not so that God chooses his workers?

Chinatown Sends Bread to China

IN connection with the diversified work of the New York Foreigners' Mission, at 5 Mott Street, there is a thriving Chinese Junior Christian Endeavor Society. These children have been following the reports from the famine field of their mother country with great interest and anxiety for the far-away sufferers.

This sympathetic interest culminated on Sunday evening, April 14, in a public service arranged by the Director of the Mission, Miss Helen F. Clark. The entire programme was presented by thirty children of the Chinese in the quarter, and it was heartily appreciated by their parents and friends, who filled the audience room. In both English and Chinese the young "Endeavorers" spoke of China's need to China's people. They read the famine news from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and conducted an instructive map exercise showing the location and extent of the famine area.

The collection taken at the close of the evening's service was a generous one.

On the following day two bright Chin boys, Lee Yuen and Seek You, who h taken a prominent part in the presentat of the programme, walked proudly i THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office bearing heavy bag filled with silver coin, as t contribution from Christian Chinatown their kindred across the sea.

Our Opportunity in China

Albany (N. Y.) Press and Knickerbocker

There is not a church in America that shoul neglect to take up special collections for th Famine Fund. Our missionaries have been goin into China for years, preaching to the heathe that Christ taught us to look with compassion o the sufferings of the unfortunate, and do all in ou power to aid them. Shall these heathen, now i the time of their direst need, be left to believ that our missionaries were hypocrites and that th Christian religion is for show and not for practica use? God forbid!

IAN MACLAREN NO MORE

WITH sincere sorrow, in which thousands of persons in every English-speaking land fully share, we read the telegram nuncing the death of Rev. John Wat- D.D., better known as Ian Maclaren. had paid several visits to country, preaching and lec- g at Yale and other uni- ties. In February of this he came again, and we the pleasure of publishing of his sermons in our issue pril 24. He had gone to to lecture to the students Wesleyan University, when was prostrated by a severe . He was obliged to post- the engagement, and kept his room in the hotel at nt Pleasant, Ia., in the of recovery. Tonsilitis, ever, developed, and this complicated by his old ny rheumatism. He suf- severely, and though the medical skill was obtained, rew worse, blood poisoning n, and on May 6 he died.

r. Watson was fifty-seven rs of age, and was in his full sical and mental vigor. ugh of Scotch parentage, he born in a little English vil- . His education was Scot- throughout, save or a brief rse in a German University. rling Grammar School led Edinburgh University, from ch he graduated M.A. He licensed by the Free Church 1874, and was at once called Barclay Church, Edinburgh, assistant minister. The fol- ing year he went as minister the Free Church of Logieal- nd, the "Drumtochty" of his books. o years later he became minister of Matthew's, Glasgow, and thence he nt in 1880 to the famous Sefton Park urch, Liverpool, of which he was min- r until last year.

It was not until 1894 that Dr. Watson came famous in the literary world. en Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush, a ies of sketches of Logiealmond society, quaint shrewd farmers of a Scottish n, startled the reading public by ir pathos and sparkling humor. These etches were followed by Auld Lang ne, dealing with the same persons and ality, and by A Doctor of the Old hool. Later Dr. Watson turned his at- tion to theological themes and a series sermons and bright paragraphic articles me from his pen.

It was not as the theologian, the scholar, or the preacher that Dr. Watson was best known or will be best remembered. He was all those, but he was the creator, or the portrait-painter, of the men and women of Drumtochty, and the fame of that achievement outshines all the others. He had not much to say by way of description; he left his characters to tell their own story. But how well we know them all! Good old Burnbrae, who, rather than change from the Free Kirk to the Established Church, was ready to leave the farm where he had been born, and where his ancestors had lived for two hundred years. The sale of his stock and furniture and the "replenishing" are described so simply and tenderly as to bring tears to the eyes.

Jamie Soutar, too, is an old friend whom one would not willingly forget. His cutting sarcasm that could make the hypocrite of the glen ashamed of cheating a widow and cause him to refund the money he had gained, won the praise of the whole glen: "There's not a man in the glen wud hae got Mary's notes back but yersel', Jamie," was no small praise. But even Jamie of "the nippy tongue" had his romance, which no one knew until thirty years later, on his death-bed, he revealed it to the minister. All this beautifully and tenderly told.

Then there is Drumsheugh, the bachelor farmer, the richest of the tenants of Lord Kilspindie, to whom the old schoolmaster appealed to send a promising boy to college. "What for should I educate Marget Hoo's bairn?" asked Drumsheugh. The old schoolmaster was indignant. "Ye think I'm asking a great thing when I plead for a pickle notes to give a puir laddie a college education? I tell ye, man, I'm honoring ye and giving ye the fairest chance ye'll ever hae o' winning wealth." Drumsheugh, thus adjured, parts with the necessary notes and Willie Hoo goes to college.

But the most thrilling portrait is that of Dr. "Weelyum" MacLure, the beloved physician of the glen, whose devotion and skill are portrayed with the hand of a master. The tall, ungainly man who loves his patients, summons a famous surgeon at a cost of five hundred dollars to perform an operation on a ploughman's wife, rides out on wintry nights through the snowdrifts to attend a sick man, and finally dies, worn out by his labors, is a hero whom one cannot but love. It was in harmony with the whole story that the minister had the epitaph placed on the monument of the self-sacrificing physician, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

Time fails us to pay the tribute due to Carmichael, the Free Kirk minister who leaves the Higher Criticism and preaches his mother's sermon; to Lachlan, who learns the pity of a father; to Mrs. Macfayden and Hillocks and the others, who cannot be mere shadows. We know and love them all. Alas that the pen which has drawn such pictures should be laid down forever! Alas that the soul which could conceive of such men and appreciate heroism in humble circumstances, and delineate it so graphically and vividly, should be no more among us! We are thankful that he has lived and was able to give us so much pleasure.

CHRIST'S STANDARD OF LIVING*

TWO conceptions of Christ's call, at first sight antagonistic, have a close nd distinct connection. His followers are illed out of the world, required to be eparate, a "peculiar" people, yet they are be in the world in close association with he world's people, that they may win new isciples for Christ. Evidently the sepa- ation of the Christian is not a physical or a cial separation. This fact has not always een realized. Men have gone into monas- eries and women into nunneries that they ight obey this injunction of separation. hey have even assumed a distinctive garb, hat their separation might be emphasized their occasional contact with the world. t is evident, however, from the rare glimpses afforded of this life, that it is not the separation Christ required. Monotony, weariness, and even temptation, are not escaped within the convent walls. It is not good for a man to be alone; not good for himself or others. He does not in his isolation rise so near to his ideal as he does among his fellow men.

Christ's prayer for his people gives us his conception of the life he designed them to live: "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from evil." That should be the Christian's ideal—in the world yet untouched by sin. This method is that which develops character. A father concerned for the welfare of his boy might seclude him from all contact with sin and wickedness. He might educate him in his own home, to avoid the danger of a public school; might keep him from society, superintend his reading, watch over him continually and yet fail of his purpose. His own death or his son's maturity must bring an end some time to his vigilance. Then the boy enters the city wholly unprepared to struggle against temptation, a weakling liable to become a prey to the enemy. On the other hand, the boy who has learned by observation, and perhaps by sad experience, the sorrows and pains of the way of the transgressor, has virility, determination and fortitude, which conflict only can give. If he only has principle, he is a stronger man for the struggles and even for the falls of his youth. It is a high standard that Christ thus sets before us: To be in the grime and yet not polluted; to be in the arctic temperature which congeals every warm impulse and yet be genial and loving; to be in contact with evil yet overcoming it. No man could hope to attain so high a standard who had not Christ's help. Having that, he may attain the heights; nothing is impossible.

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

CHAPTER XII

THERE was great excitement in the Alley. Katy Goldburg had been away ten whole days, and now she was home, and was fairly bubbling over with the story of her experiences.

"Ye jest oughter been thar," she crowed triumphantly, from her position on the top step. "It was jest grand!—the bootifulest place ye ever see!"

"Whar is it?" demanded Patty Murphy. Patty was seated sideways on the lowest step, hugging her knees, and looking eagerly into Katy's face.

"Oh, it's 'way, 'way off, an' the ride ter git thar is jest as nice as the place is."

"Hain't it got no name?" asked another voice.

"Sure!" nodded Katy. "It's—it's—"

"Ho! I don't b'lieve ye know now," jeered Patty.

"I do, too," insisted Katy. "It's Mount—Mount—"

"Mebbe it's Mount Washin'ton," cried a big boy from the sidewalk. "I've heard o' that. There's snow an' ice an' rippin' big winds, an'—"

"Well, it jest ain't Mount Washin'ton, Tom Whalen," retorted Katy, indignantly. "I know what 'tis now. It's Mount-Lawn; an' thar ain't a mite o' snow thar, nor ice, nor rippin' big winds, either. They—they wouldn't allow 'em thar—so now!" she declared with some dignity.

"Well, what is there, then?" questioned Tom derisively. "I'll bet ye don't know!"

Katy tossed her head; then she held up ten grimy fingers and began to check off the advantages of the wonderful Mont-Lawn.

"Thar's trees, an' grass, an' eatin', an' sleepin' in beds in a row, an' playin', an' swingin', an'—an' eatin'—an' flowers,' an' singin' songs, an'—an' eatin'—"

"Ho! You've said that three times already," cut in Patty.

"Well, we eat three times a day," flashed Katy, triumphantly; "an' all we want ev'ry time, too. 'Taters an' meat, an' berries an' cookies, an'—"

"Say, Katy, how much does it cost ter get there?" demanded a new voice from the sidewalk. The questioner was a thin-faced little girl with blue eyes and tangled yellow curls.

"Three whole dollars—Skinny Goldstein said so; an' ye can stay ten whole days. Mebbe you was a-thinkin' o' goin', Maggie; eh?"

"Mebbe I was," returned Mag of the Alley with a toss of her head as she turned away.

In the corner of the basement room that night Maggie and the other members of the co-operative household held a council of war. As usual, Maggie was chief spokesman.

"Look a-here, Patty, do you s'pose we could do it?" she demanded. "You heard what Katy said, an' it must be a awful nice place. You see there's you an' me an' the twins—that's four of us—an' 'course we couldn't all go an' stay ten days, 'cause that would take four three dollars, an' that would be be—well, a awful heap of money. But if we could get one three dollars, then we could all go an' stay a piece of the ten days—divvy it up even, ye know. Mebbe some of us'd have ter move in in the night, but we wouldn't care if we only got there, ye know. What d' ye say? Shall we try for it?"

There was a shout of approval, then four heads bent close together over a prolonged discussion of ways and means.

It was agreed that all moneys should be placed as usual in the old tin cup on the top shelf of the cupboard, only now the most rigid economy was to be practised. No longer were they to indulge in sumptuous repasts of chipped beef and garlic, pie and cheese, or hot frankfurters, when the jingling contents of the cup testified that the day's haul had been good. Rather would they subsist on stale bread (which cost little), or better yet on what they could appropriate to themselves without the formality of asking leave. They estimated that before the summer was gone the three dollars ought to be ready. They had only their food to consider. Rent, fortunately, did not enter into the list of expenses; and as for clothing—when one was absolutely in tatters, there was always some kind-hearted woman who had for that one a dress or a coat that would at least hang together.

It was while the committee on ways and means was in the height of the discussion that Mrs Whalen entered the room.

"Hi, thar, Mag," she called. "Look at what the pretty lady left for ye!" And she tossed a crumpled one-dollar bill across the room. (There had been two five-dollar bills on the table when Mrs. Kendall left an hour before; but Mrs. Whalen, upon seeing Maggie's share, suddenly concluded to charge rent for the corner, and had decided that four dollars was "about right." This little matter being settled to her satisfaction, there was, of course, only one dollar left for the child.) "It's great luck ye're a-havin'—so 'tis!"

Maggie sprang to her feet and pounced on the bill. Her eyes grew big as she saw what it was.

"It's a whole dollar, Patty—a whole dollar! Why, here we've got one of them Mont-Lawn dollars already, an' we don't have ter get but two more. Only think, Patty—two more!" she cried joyously; then her eyes narrowed with sudden suspicion, and she turned sharply toward Mrs. Whalen.

"What's that lady want me ter do?" she demanded.

"'Ter do'?"

"Yes, yes! What have I got ter do for that dollar?"

"Why, nothin'. She jest give it to ye."

"Give it to me!" exclaimed Maggie, incredulously. "An' ain't she comin' for me ter paste no bags, nor sew, nor nothin'?"

"I reckon not. Anyhow, she said she give it to ye 'cause ye've got blue eyes!"

For one brief instant Maggie stared in amazement; then she gave a shrill laugh—but that, also, was almost instantly checked.

"Look a-here, Mis' Whalen," she called sharply. "There's somethin' here that ain't straight. If that lady what left the dollar comes again, you jest tell her I ain't ter home, an' that I ain't a-comin' back. Tell her I've gone away for my health!" she finished derisively, as she caught up the tin cup, and crushed the dollar-bill into the smallest possible space at the bottom.

It was not an easy task—this accumulating riches; but the four children worked indefatigably, and bit by bit the hoard in the old tin cup grew. Never before had Maggie worked so late over the flowers; never before in the neighborhood were errands so swiftly run, nor babies so eagerly tended—and never before did food left out the window to cool, so quickly disappear. In spite of this last fact, however, the children sometimes went hungry to bed. But all the hardships of the struggle were forgotten when on the first of August Maggie, carefully bearing the tin cup, hurried down the street toward the home of the City Missionary. The longed-for sum was complete, and Katy Goldburg had said that the City Missionary would know what to do with it.

Maggie did not know the City Missionary. She had seen her once or twice, but she had always run around the corner when the lady appeared in the Alley. Maggie did not trust strangers much. She was a little afraid now: but she comforted herself by saying that she was not a beggar, and that she had "money ter pay." So with head held high, and the tin cup clutched tightly in one hand, she rang the City Missionary's doorbell. Five minutes later she had told her story, turned the contents of the cup into the Missionary's lap, and was breathlessly waiting for the Missionary to speak.

The Missionary did not speak, however—at once. She coughed, choked a little, and wiped her eyes with her handkerchief; then she smiled a little tremulously.

"But, my dear," she said gently, "I can't take this money. We never take money from the children."

Maggie's face fell.

"Ye see, we—we wanted ter go so," she faltered. "'Course we couldn't get enough for all of us ter stay all the time, but we thought we'd divvy up an' each stay part of it. We—we had it all fixed."

"I know, dear, but you don't understand. The children themselves don't ever pay to go to Mont-Lawn. Kind people all over the land send the money and give them this treat."

The old look of suspicion came into Maggie's eyes.

"Give it to 'em!" she cried. "What—for nothin'?"

"Yes, so that they may have ten happy days in the country."

"An' they don't get 'em there ter paste bags nor sew on buttons, nor nothin'?"

"Why, certainly not! What an idea! What put such a thought into your head?"

Maggie was silent. This was even more puzzling than the pretty lady who had left the dollar. She could not understand it at all.

"You say there are four of you?" asked the Missionary, after a moment.

"Yes'um."

"Very well, dear. You shall tell me where you live, and this afternoon I'll come to see you. Perhaps, after all, there'll be a chance for some of you to go to Mont-Lawn, if not for all of you."

Five minutes later a very dazed, but happy, Maggie was hurrying toward home still clutching the old tin cup—a cup which had not lost even a penny of its wealth.

CHAPTER XIII

GREAT was the rejoicing in one corner of the Whalen kitchen when the astounding news came that Patty, Maggie and the twins might, after all, go to Mont-Lawn; and that not only could all four go, but each could stay the entire ten days; there was to be no "divvying up," no "moving in in the night."

Maggie, however, was nonplussed. This wholesale generosity was most extraordinary in her eyes, and the more she thought of it, the more sure she felt that, after all, no good was to come of it. She determined to keep a sharp lookout for some one who would put them to some hated task and hold them there prisoners ever after.

e medical examination at the Bible se was the first ordeal, and it ptly added fuel to the fire of Mag-e suspicions. In spite of the kindness n gentleness of the physician in ge, the little girl was thoroughly tened when her own turn came to nt herself for inspection. Even assurance that it was all merely to if she were quite well enough to rved but to convince her more than that hard labor awaited her at the of the journey. The joyous anticion all about her, however, proved gious, and before the Grand Central tion was reached, she was almost as ed as the others.

"We went in a boat last year," volun-
ed a small boy at her right, who had to Mont-Lawn before, "an' 'twas grand! But 'course the cars is jest good, an' I never rode in the cars;
you?"

Maggie did not answer. They had end the great waiting-room of the sta-
, and she was looking about her with , startled eyes. Sometime, somere, she had seen a place like this re. But where? When?

t was big an' tall like this, an' I ed an' stayed an' stayed; an' then—then—" Her words came more and e slowly, stopping at last altogether.

Maggie's recollections of her mother of her past life were very indistinct.
metime, some one had told her that mother was dead. She knew that. had been old Sullivan on the day he taken her home to be his "li'lle gal,") away back in the shadows of her mory were two stone lions; but the days of labor with needle and te-pot, the blows, the angry words
e much more vivid, and had blotted almost everything else. Somewhere those far-away memories, however, the vision of a sweet-faced woman a loving smile—but always when ggie tried to place it, it was gone.
ere was just one tangible thing left from those forgotten days, and even s possessed no special significance her, though she sometimes took it and fingered it curiously, almost erently. It was a fine linen handker-ef with the name "Margaret Kendall" one corner. It had been a tight little ist ball in her fingers that first night en she had gone to bed in the Mcnis attic, and she had kept it ever ce safely tucked away in her clothing.

"That was my name, once," she would isper sometimes, as she gazed proudly the letters in the corner—and as she ked, the sweet-faced woman with the ile would seem almost real; the next tant the vision would be gone, and ly the letters and the handkerchief uld remain.

The wait of the Mont-Lawn party in e Grand Central Station was not long, d before many minutes the crowd of ited, happy children had marched into e special car waiting for them. Here ain Maggie looked about her in perexity. When before had she seen a g, narrow room like this with windows either side?

"Hi, thar, Mag! ain't this great?"
lled Patty, gleefully. And as she oke the train started.

What a ride that was, to be sure!
ow they chatted and laughed and oficked—those little waifs from the t, crowded tenements; and as the city s left behind, and the broad fields d far-reaching meadows flashed into ew, how wide and wonder-filled grew e eyes that knew only a neighboring of for a horizon!

In the wondrous delight of it all Mag-e almost forgot her fears; yet the ought would come to her at times:
hy was all this pleasure given to em? What must they do at the end to y for it?

When Tarrytown was reached, there as yet another delight—the ferryboat at was to take them across the Hud-n; but even the boatride was forgotten the excitement of climbing into the g stages that were found to be waiting or them across the river. Then came e two-mile drive when each revolution
f the wheels seemed to bring a yet greater wonder into view, and when each turn of the road was hailed with yet louder shouts of delight. At last the "Children's Paradise"—Mont-Lawn itself—burst into view, and the little travelers gave one long "Oh-h!" of rapture.

Maggie jumped from her place in one of the coaches and looked sharply about her. Now was the time when one must be very wary; now was the time when the reason for all this unheard-of generosity would be divulged. All about her the children raced and scampered from point to point, laughing, shouting, and all talking at once. Some were visiting old haunts, remembered from last year; others were exploring for the first time the wonders of the marvelous home that was to be theirs for ten days.

Maggie's dazed eyes swept the wide lawns, the beautiful buildings, and the broad expanse of hillside, but her feet did not stir. She stood alone—silent, wondering, and distrustful, in spite of the joy all about her.

"All alone, my dear?" asked a cheery voice. "Perhaps you have never been here before. Don't you know any of these boys and girls? Would you like to come with me for a walk?"

Maggie turned quickly. A bright-eyed, pleasant-faced young woman stood near, holding out her hand. Maggie's first impulse was to grasp the outstretched hand and trust herself to the young woman's guidance; then she suddenly remembered; away back in the old days of bag-pasting, the woman who had returned her to the Swaney cellar had smiled and had been wonderfully gentle—at first. It was this second thought that made Maggie turn now and run swiftly away with a frightened backward glance over her shoulder.

"Why, the poor little dear!" murmured the young woman, gazing after her small guest with a puzzled frown. She had seen many a shy child at Mont-Lawn, but never before one with that look of terror in her eyes.

Maggie stayed close by Patty and the twins after that; and it was with them that she marched to the beautiful pavilion for supper.

What a feast it was, and how the good things did disappear down the hungry little throats! Maggie ate all she could, still with sharp eyes glancing from side to side; and before she rose from the table she managed to secrete in her dress four cookies and two slices of bread. They were still there when, a little later, she was taken to one of the dormitories and piloted down the long rows of snowy beds to her own especial nest. The same pleasant-faced young woman that had spoken to her before supper spied her now, and came to help her undress, and it was she that found the four crumbling cookies and the two slices of bread tucked inside of the ragged little dress.

"Why, my dear child! what is this?" she cried in amazement.

Maggie flushed. Her eyes grew hard and defiant. She did not reply.

"Where did you get this food, dear? Won't you tell me, please?" asked the teacher, gently.

"I—I hid it when I et supper," stammered Maggie in a low voice.

"But why?"

"For ter-morrer, of course," returned the little girl in some surprise.

"But you'll have more to-morrow at the table, dear. Didn't you know that?"

There was a moment's hesitation, then Maggie uptilted her chin.

"Yes, I know. Katy said we would, but I didn't believe it."

"Why not?"

There was no answer.

The teacher hesitated; then she looked at the flushed, defiant little face.

"Never mind, dear; we'll talk of this to-morrow. We want to be quite sure when we take things away with us that they are ours to take," she said gently; "but we'll talk about that part to-morrow. You are tired now. I'll promise you this, however, you shall have all you want to eat every day while you're here." And she stooped and gave Maggie a loving kiss.

Because This Is the ONLY Vibrator That Gives the NECESSARY Number of Vibrations, DOUBLE the VIBRATIONS Given by ANY Other at ANY Price.

Everyone knows now that Proper Vibratory Massage is the natural way—the sure, safe and speedy way to increase vital force—greater nerve energy—longer life—better health—a finer appearance—therefore greater success in life and more happiness.

Leading physicians and specialists all over the world now recognize that 95 per cent of all "the ills that human flesh is heir to" are caused entirely by congestion and that proper vibration removes congestion and thus cures our ills. Now "vibration" simply is—"rapid motion to and fro"—so it naturally follows that the more rapid the vibration is, the greater it is, and the more effective it is.

Thus 30,000 vibrations per minute constitute proper vibration and this rapidity is absolutely necessary in order to secure proper results. The Swedish Electric Massage Vibrator is the only vibrator which has this necessary high efficiency because our exclusive, protected method is the only one that can give 30,000 vibrations per minute.

No other vibrator made gives more than 15,000 vibrations per minute—only half the necessary number—most vibrators give much less than this—so, as compared to the Swedish Vibrator, they are not vibrators, but mere "pounders." And they cost from $35 to $100. You buy a vibrator to get vibrations—the Swedish Electric Massage Vibrator will give you double the number of vibrations that you would get from a $100 vibrator—so probably the Swedish Vibrator ought to cost you double the price viz:—$200—We charge you only $12.50 cash—that's an honest price. The Swedish Vibrator will pay for itself very soon in the saving of doctor's and druggist's bills.

No dangerous electric light wires are needed with this vibrator. The Special Long-Service Batteries are all in the portable case and are guaranteed to last one full year. Renewals $1.00 per set.

"The Dinner-Pail Man"

George L. McNutt at the Bowery Mission

SEVERAL times lately, during his stay in New York City, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Rev. George L. McNutt, "the Dinner-Pail Man," has visited the Bowery Mission. Seldom, if ever, have the men been so impressed by a speaker as by this able and original man. His vigorous personality, his breezy talks, and his genial comradeship extended to men who had come to consider themselves outside the pale of decent society, will never be forgotten.

On one of his visits, he appeared bringing two apples, one the best and most beautiful he could buy, the other a wizened specimen that had cost him one cent. From these he preached a wonderful sermon on the necessity of living in the sunshine.

Rev. Geo. L. McNutt

On another occasion he delivered a most effective address on "How Men Are Made," his introduction being the relating of his experience in a factory where air-brakes were made, and his points being, first, the idea; secondly, the model; thirdly, the material; fourthly, the tools; lastly, the shop.

Mr. McNutt is unique in his methods of studying sociology at first hand. He goes right to the heart of things. His investigation of the conditions in which Bowery men live was most thorough. The following article was written by him specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on the work of the Bowery Mission:

I was delighted with what I saw at the Bowery Mission. The atmosphere of the singing, praying and testimonies was charged and surcharged with the deepest evangelistic spirit. Somehow it seemed to me that the words meant more, had a deeper, truer ring, when I knew that the things being said were the sequel of the things being done for the suffering, lonesome, hungry, despondent boys mostly from the great West.. I am sure that I never felt greater freedom in speaking than when I knew that the words of sympathy and hope I uttered in His name were being backed up by rolls and coffee, and the Memorial Home, and a chance to get a job in His name. I believe that these methods might be questioned by scientific philanthropy. I only know that Christ fed the hungry, healed the sick, and was a friend to the outcast, and after he had ministered to these somebodies of God, he uttered in simple, natural manner the words that inspire our songs and sermons. I know also that he says in simple, awful words, that in that last day my creed, my profession, my preaching will avail me nothing, save as it has been vitalized by my social deeds.

When on Easter at one o'clock in the morning I saw 1,000 men being fed, and the work of the feeding being done by men once in the bread line, I thought I saw a living commentary on the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew. A bread line without the bread of life being freely offered may be useless and dangerous. The Christ method was to do things, and then to preach. It seems to me that that is what I saw being done at the Bowery Mission and at the Memorial Home.

The redemption of the world is a question of ways and means. The Bowery Mission is working along the right lines—working its way back to the Christ method. With the good that you do, the crowd will hear the word gladly. The Bowery Mission is flying with two wings. I see progress. I look for vastly greater progress in the new building that will indeed be a Gospel shop.

The Things Which Jesus Did

And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books.

So wrote the beloved disciple, in loving remembrance of his Master's strenuous life. The Nazarene went about doing good, and then spoke the good, the wonderful words that thrill the world. I wonder if we have not lost the significance of the Christ method. Some will even say that religion has nothing to do with a hungry man's stomach or his body. Save his soul, they say; get him right with God. True enough; but Christ dealt with the whole man. Christ was pre-eminently original, practical, scientific, sympathetic, far-seeing—he dealt with the whole man. The greater part of his time and strength was spent ministering to the physical and social needs of the class of men we are wont to call nobodies. After he had ministered, then, with the deed done as a text, he spoke over and over again those wonderful words that we sing. I wonder at times, as I meet men in the utter apathy of despair—men who are drunk because they are down and out, or are down and out because they are drunk—I wonder if the wonderful words we speak in His name would not have greater power if they, like his words, were uttered as the natural logic of what we had done. A bird cannot fly with one wing; it can only flop. It makes a great deal of noise and commotion, but very little forward motion. We try to fly with one wing. The spiritual is one wing; the physical the other. With only one wing, physical or spiritual, we flop.

GOD IN THE DESERT

By Mrs. M. Baxter

HAT child of God is there, among such as have been eminently used of him, who knows nothing of ·? Speaking of his own mistaken n his days of unbelief, the apostle says: "I obtained mercy because it ignorantly in unbelief"; and rmore, he ventured to believe that was glorified especially in the grace he had shown to him, "the chief of s" (1. Tim. 1: 13-15). Something e same sense of shame mingled with eepest gratitude to God may have the heart of Moses when he entered nd of Midian as a refugee.

s first halting-place there was by a e. The seven daughters of Jethro, the ie, or priest, of Midian, came to water father's flock, for water was too ous at some seasons to be left to the ction of hired or slave shepherds. other shepherds claimed the water, drove away these young women. The ly Moses could not suffer this; he d up and helped them"—not too ab- d with his own unexpected reverse of me to forget, or fail to help, others were in trouble. He is a coward who lf-absorbed. A mind stayed on God not brood over its own troubles or gs. The Lord was with Moses as he been with Joseph. Jethro's daughters ed to their father what had happened, he reproved them for neglecting to g the Egyptian stranger home with . Moses found a humble occupation ttending Jethro's sheep; and in the of God this was no degradation; it indeed a forward step toward the t ministry for which he was being ly prepared. He who has learned ccept anything and everything God nits, has learned in a school of ch the highest education of earth falls rt.

Forty years elapsed; Jethro's daughter porah had become Moses' wife, and had borne him two sons, one of whom he named Gershom, "a stranger here." It was a recognition that his stay in Midian was transient, that he had not yet entered upon his life's vocation. But if, as is probable, he was in the habit of communing with God in the neighborhood of Mount Horeb, the presence of God was still home to him, and in his banishment also "he endured, as seeing him who is invisible" (Heb. 11: 27). The calling of God was still the thing he lived for; all else he passed through as a pilgrim and a stranger. God, who knows the value of time, had not accounted forty years too long a time for Moses to unlearn the forty years of Egyptian education. In the littleness of daily life he gave the future deliverer of his people an opportunity to test what the philosophy of Egypt could do for a man, to prove how far all he had learned from man could enable him to bear the rude reverses to which he had been subjected. He had proved that the faith in God, learned at his mother's knee, had done more to prepare him for his trial than all his school life in Egypt. His after life proves that he learned in the school of the desert how to fall back upon God for all.

Moses led his father-in-law's flocks "to the back of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb." While he was tending the flock, "the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush." All he saw was a bush burning without turning to ashes. Moses was familiar enough with natural law to recognize in this something supernatural, and he said, "I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt." But he was warned that the sight was supernatural. "Draw not nigh hither," said a voice; put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." (Verses 4, 5.)

Realized Presence*

NE idea alone, apart from every other true and beautiful thought in Christianity, suffices to raise it above ry other religion that has appeared in world. It is that of the living Christ, e who died and yet lives, one who is in world still and will be here to the end. is that which gives to Christianity its wer and vitality and makes it a living, iding force, that can transform charac- and make the man on whom it lays ld a new man, with new principles, new ibitions and new hopes. No man can be e same man again who has once realized at Christ is with him and in him, per- eating and energizing and elevating him. e may hold what theory he will about the rgin birth, about the resurrection, or any her doctrine of Christianity; he is a new an when he is conscious of Christ being his heart controlling his affections and sires, and in his will controlling his con- ct. It is not then he who lives, but rist who lives in him. "It is I, August; you not know me?" said a sinful com- nion of his past life to St. Augustine, hen, after his conversion, she met him on e street and he passed her by as a anger. "Yes, I know," said the saint, ut I am not August now." So she und, for there was nothing in him that as like her former friend.

Much mysticism has been uttered about is doctrine, but there are hints in ordi- ry life that help us to understand it. We e how a father lives in a son who loves d reveres him; how a man is changed by e influence of his wife; how even the mpanionship of a friend affects the char- ter. The best and noblest, however, e powerless to use the influence, unless there is something responsive in the subject. The friend can do nothing unless he is loved and admired; then there is no limit to the power of his influence. That is the material on which it acts and evokes results. It is this that Paul refers to when he speaks of beholding as in a mirror the glory of Christ and being changed into the same image. The man who loves becomes like the one he loves, not only in obeying his commandments, but in having his spirit. Christ thus lives in him, dwells in him permanently and directs all his actions. There is nothing mystical in this; it is a sublime fact. As we see a man of this kind doing some noble deed, making some grand self-sacrifice, we realize that it is Christ in him that is really doing the deed through his willing instrument.

"Filled with goodness and crowned with blessing." Such is the comment made by her neighbors in Stillwater, N. Y., upon the long life of Mrs. Charlotte Haskins. On the seventeenth of March, Mrs. Haskins celebrated her ninety-sixth birthday with a degree of good health, both physical and mental, rarely vouchsafed to one who attains to such advanced age. For seventy-one years this venerable Christian woman has been a faithful member of the Baptist household of faith, and to her the Bible is the Book of books. The recent anniversary of her birth was marked by personal calls from her numerous friends, who surrounded her with tokens of their love and respect.

I BELIEVE the "Basket Washing Machine" is the best and cheapest machine in the world today, and I am honest in that statement. The reason I believe it is because there is not another machine made that will do a washing and do it good in so short a time.

"I'll Send and Pay the Freight on a Basket Washing Machine to any point East of the Mississippi for $3.50."
MAYOR TUNNINGTON.

Yes, I'm Mayor of Fremont, Ohio.

Am Mayor now; and it is because I am Mayor that I have taken up this work.

There's no one in a position to feel the pulse of a community as well as that community's chief executive. He hears of the reverses in life, the hardships, the disappointments; he is supposed to be counselor, adviser, and able to suggest a remedy for all evils.

Well, I believe that by placing the "Basket Washing Machine" upon the market at $3.50—a machine that will wash as well as any machine made I've lightened the burdens of more people than by any other method I might pursue. That was my idea in making the Basket Washer. This is an age of reform, square deal, glad hand, uplifting of humanity. We're here to help each other, give each other a fair chance. I am doing it. I know I am doing that every day, for I am daily sending washing machines to every part of the country and paying the freight myself.

You understand, don't you, why this appeals to me? You must see why I know the urgent, pressing need for a high-grade machine at the lowest possible cost. I see it every day. I saw it until I made up my mind that such a machine should be offered to every one, and I shall do that to the limit of my ability.

I don't ask you to keep the Washer if you are not satisfied with it. Send it back at my expense. But I don't believe you will send it. There has never been one returned.

After you have discovered for yourself, by actual experience, that a tub of clothes can be washed in six minutes and less, and be washed clean by either you or your little girl, you are pretty certain to keep the Basket Washer. Then there is the price $3.50 cheaper than any other good washer was ever before offered. And I'll go further: I'll guarantee it for five years, and it'll do a washing every day for that length of time.

WRITE TO ME TO-DAY ABOUT IT, OR, BETTER STILL, ORDER ONE. It is so simple that only a small circular is necessary to describe it fully.

India Nearing Revolution

A Scene at the Great Durbar in India, Held to Celebrate the Accession of King Edward

ALMOST prophetic were the words uttered by Lord Canning in 1856, when, replying at a public meeting to the good wishes expressed to him on setting out for India, he said: "I wish for a peaceful term of office; but I cannot forget that in the sky of India, serene as it is, a small cloud may arise, no larger than a man's hand, but which, growing larger, may at last threaten to burst, and overwhelm us with ruin." The small cloud did arise, and in the storm that followed, the land of India was submerged in blood, and the horrors and barbarities of that appalling time sent a shock through the whole civilized world. Again a cloud has risen on the horizon of India, ominous and threatening. At this distance, and even to those near at hand who are separated from the teeming millions of India's people by the barriers of race, it is scarcely possible to measure the extent of the portent. So secretly do the schemes and plots of the Oriental work, that none can tell how far the discontent and the unrest have permeated native society. Here and there, however, signs have appeared that may well cause serious concern to the government there and in London.

Early this month there were grave riots at Rawalpindi in the Punjab. A Hindu mob destroyed a mission church, burned the Y. M. C. A. building, pillaged the post-office and burned a power house. They molested the Europeans in the streets and broke the windows in some of the houses occupied by the English. The rioters appeared to be moved by racial rather than national animosity. Not only the English property, which was owned by people against whom they may have had a grievance, but property owned by Americans, was destroyed. The theory seems to have been, "India for the Asiatics" and exclusion of all foreigners. A day or two later there was a similar outbreak at Allahabad in the Northwest Provinces, which destroyed the house of the local magistrate and assaulted all the Europeans who were accessible. On May 14, there were serious riots at Delhi, in the course of which a statue of her late Majesty Queen Victoria was defaced, and the crown on its head was struck off.

In each case the rioters were speedily subdued by the local police, aided by small detachments of military, but their significance is of great moment as indicating the spirit of the people and the unrest which must be very deep and widespread to issue in overt acts of open lawlessness. There are rumors of similar disturbances in eastern Bengal, and even in southern India, where, in Madras itself, it has been found necessary to patrol the streets with soldiers. The boldness of the rioters increases as the movement spreads. The men arrested in the Punjab were met as they were being taken from the court to the jail and an attempt was made to rescue them. They were, however, too strongly guarded for the attempt to succeed, but the officers in charge of them were pelted with mud and stones, and the prisoners were decorated with garlands of flowers. That the movement of which these acts are indications is extremely serious, is generally acknowledged. Mr. John Morley, the Secretary for India in the home government, stated in Parliament that the disorders had assumed a very grave aspect, and had created a feeling of great unrest throughout India.

So far as can be learned from the meagre reports yet at hand the cause of the discontent is not due to any oppressive measures on the part of the government, but rather to the facilities granted to the natives. There has been for some years past a thorough reorganization of the educational system, both primary and in the higher branches; and in all castes the standards have been raised, endowments have been increased and government scholarships have been freely granted to the natives. In addition to these advantages, the natives have been admitted to higher ranks in the government service. Both in the clerical bureaus and in the judiciary some very responsible offices are now held by natives, and the government has been frequently warned that it was running a serious risk by placing so large a share of its functions in native hands. The native press also has taken a hand in the development of dissatisfaction. Sedition has been published unchecked and day after day the most scurrilous and abusive articles have appeared, written by the very men whom the government has educated.

Articles of a strongly inflammatory character were written by men peculiarly able to play on native feelings and prejudices. The British government, reluctant to interfere with free speech, unwisely ignored this agitation and suffered the continued incentives to violence to go on without interference. It was at last

THE RETURNED FLAGS

I SOMETIMES think we make a mistake when we think of the Civil War as ending at Appomattox. The wounds were too fresh then on both sides. We know that the war is ended now, and I think the beginning of the end dated about twenty years ago. The beginning of the end came in a letter which Adjutant-General R. C. Drum, on April 30, 1887, addressed to Hon. W. C. Endicott, Secretary of War in President Cleveland's Cabinet. The letter went thus:

"SIR: I have the honor to state that there are now in this office, stored in one of the attic rooms of the building, a number of Union flags captured in action, but recovered on the fall of the Confederacy and forwarded to the War Department for safe keeping, together with a number of Confederate flags, which the fortunes of war placed in our hands during the late Civil War. While in the past favorable action has always been taken on applications, properly supported, for the return of the Union flags to organizations representing survivors of the military service of the government, I beg to submit that it would be a graceful act to anticipate future requests of this nature, and venture to suggest the propriety of returning all the flags (Union and Confederate) to the authorities of the respective States in which the regiments which bore those colors were organized.

While in all the civilized nations of the Old World trophies taken in wars against foreign enemies have been carefully preserved and exhibited as proud mementoes of the nation's military glories, wise and obvious reasons have always excepted from the rule evidences of past internecine troubles which, by appeals to the arbitration of the sword, have disturbed the peaceful march of a people to its destiny. Over twenty years have elapsed since the termination of the late Civil War. Many of the prominent leaders, civil and military, are now honored representatives of the people in the national council or in other eminent positions, and lend the aid of their talents to the wise administration of the affairs of the whole country, and the people of the several States composing the Union are now united, treading the broader road to a glorious future. Very truly yours, R. C. DRUM,

"Adjutant-General."

But were the people in 1887 united? No sooner did President Cleveland allow Secretary Endicott to approve the suggestion of his adjutant-general, than a great howl of denunciation arose. By one of the leading newspapers of Minnesota, Cleveland was assailed with opprobrious epithets. The newspapers East and West excoriated him. Over the public banquet tables General B. F. Butler, General Lucius Fairchild, commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, Murat Halstead and others hurled their vituperations. The then Governor of Ohio wrote a letter, which Senator John Sherman endorsed, in which he emphatically refused to surrender the flags, saying: "No rebel flags shall be returned while I am Governor." General Fairchild said: "May God palsy the hand that wrote the order. May God palsy the brain that conceived it, and may God palsy the tongue that dictated it." So overwhelming was the public bitterness at the thought of giving back the captured flags that the President had to rescind the order to deliver up to the Southern States their flags, on the ground that the flags were the property of the United States, and therefore the United States alone had the right to return them.

Sectional Bitterness Dead

Oh, the sectional bitterness which was rankling in the human hearts North and South in 1887! But in spite of that fact, that letter of R. C. Drum's proved to be the beginning of the end. Rapidly and surely the last fires of sectional strife died away. In 1898, the very men who had most vehemently opposed the returning of the Confederate flags were most anxious to see Major McKinley do what President Cleveland had failed to accomplish. On February 24, 1898, Congress passed the bill authorizing the war department to return all the Confederate flags captured in battle. Governor Foraker, who had fought the movement before, was then senator, and he was the most enthusiastic advocate of the bill. Yes, yes, at last the Civil War was ended. At last, by the voluntary return of the blood-soaked battle-flags, the United States Congress declared there was no North, no South, no East, no West, no conquerors and no vanquished. The Confederate battle-flags were given back to the men whose comrades had baptized them with their life's blood.

Memorial Day in Arlington Cemetery

Why did the North return those old battle-flags of the Southern army? First, the Northerners realized that the Southerners were honest men and had been honest in their advocacy of the State rights principle all through the war. The Northerners realized that the same fidelity to principle which made Massachusetts and Illinois and Wisconsin and California fight for the centralization of government drove Georgia and Alabama and South Carolina to fight for State rights. These men, born below the Mason and Dixon line, were not dishonest or mercenary. They were fighting for a principle, because they believed the principle was just. And for that principle they were ready to sacrifice their lives.

Blue and Gray in Fellowship

But some years had to pass before the boys in blue and the boys in gray could meet and fellowship together, and recognize each other's honesty. It is almost impossible for a man who is fighting to believe that his opponent, whose doubled fist is pummeling and beating him, has an honest heart or a straight hair in his head. But after the battle is over, after time has cooled the blood, after our adversary may have been laid away in his silent grave, then we are able to look at our past actions and those of our enemies as through another's eyes. Then we see that both of us may have been honest in our ideas, but both or one of us may have been mistaken in our judgment.

If those Southerners were not honest in their advocacy of State rights, how can you account for the actions of Robert E. Lee? Study the history of the man any way you will, and you will find him a noble, true hero through and through. He certainly did not enter the Southern army for fame. Had he stayed in the Northern army, he might have been commander of all the United States forces. He knew he was slated as the successor of Winfield Scott. Surely that was fame enough for any man. He did not enter the Southern army for mercenary motives. He was already wealthy in his own right and Arlington Heights, his home, was just across the Potomac. He knew that if he entered the Southern cause, his property might be confiscated and his homestead demolished. Yet without hesitation he sacrificed an honorable position, land, family, homestead and money, and threw them all into the Southern cause. Then study the life of Robert E. Lee after the civil war. Even amid poverty, after his great pillared mansion had been exchanged for an old tumble-down negro hut, not fit for an outhouse or a ore was still another reason why those old flags were ned. No sooner was the war over than the South- nen began to work side by side with their Northern trymen for the upbuilding of the nation. They ged the sword for the plow, the gun for the mow- achine. But they did more; they began to work he benefit of the North as well as for the South, he West as well as for the East. And as in the ish-American war U. S. Grant, Jr., served upon staff of Fitzhugh Lee, and Joe Wheeler fought r the Stars and Stripes by the side of Lawton, so by side in Congressional halls and on judicial h and in mercantile establishment the Southerners ed with the Northerners for the development of whole nation. You could not find any difference nese men's patriotism by the place of their birth. was very much struck with this fact when my I ran over the names prominent in our national lative halls thirty years ago. A great army of smen had entered Washington from our Southern States. Nearly all of these men had worn the Confederate gray or been prominent in Richmond. There were Alexander Stephens and Lamar, and Harris and Gordon, and Pugh and Morgan, and Wade Hampton and Zebulon Vance, and F. C. Cockerell and M. C. Butler, and Berry, and a great number of others too numerous to mention. My, what a list there was! When we read their names, it seems as though we hear the bugle call and the rattling of arms and the yelling of the cavalry charge. When we look into the United States Senate of thirty years ago it seems as though the field-officers of a great Confederate army had been collected for a council of war. But though those Southern statesmen assembled in Washington, they were not assembled for a council of war, but for a council of peace. Those ex-Confederate soldiers were planning and contriving for the prosperity of the whole United States and not for a part. They were working hand and glove with their Northern colleagues for the success of our reunited land. And though the North, as a whole, in the early seventies did not have confidence in the loyalty of the new South, the Northern statesmen in Washington who came in touch with those Southern statesmen learned to trust the South.

When such true leaders as Charles Sumner from Massachusetts, and Lucius Lamar from Mississippi, and hundreds and thousands of men like them, could strive as soon as the Civil War was over to weld this broad country together, is it any wonder that after a while the rank and file should fall into line and cry, "My countrymen, know one another and you will love one another"? Oh, yes; the return of the Confederate flags by the North was a natural sequence to such a patriotic love as that. No sooner was the Appomattox treaty signed than the true spirit of the North and the South started in to obliterate sectional strife.

Mutual Hospitalities

Lastly, I remark that the North gave back the Confederate flags because the two sections of our country, by travel and intercommunication, got acquainted and learned to know each other. The Northerners traveled South and they had a taste of Southern hospitality, including the hot breads and the johnny-cakes, and they liked them. And the Southerners traveled North and learned that there was some chivalry and warm, loving hearts beating among the New England snows, as well as among the Georgia flowers. And a new generation began to grow up which knew not Joseph. The college boys of the North would persist in falling in love with the bright-eyed maidens from the South. The sons of the old Southern brigadier-generals would persist in attacking the firesides of their fathers' old enemies and carrying away the Northern girls as willing captives in the old war called Love. Cupid's darts were flying everywhither, until at last the North awoke and said, "Why, those Southern boys are not born with horns and cloven feet." And the Southerners began saying: "Why, those Northerners do love something besides the dollar." Then the golden cords of affection began to entwine themselves about Northern heart and Southern heart, until the same blood by the cradle was being pumped through the arteries of both. Had the North known the South and the South known the North in 1857, as they do in 1907, there would have been no Civil War. That war for the most part was caused by the ignorance of the different sections of each other.

Thus, brave men of the North and brave men of the South, in the name of our reunited country, before the approaching Memorial Day, I salute you. You two classes of veterans have not only proved to the world that you are physical heroes, but greater than this, that you are moral and spiritual heroes. You have not only proved to the great wide world that you have courage and backbone enough to fight, but that you also have nobility of soul enough to forget and forgive past differences. In this beautiful land of ours, for three hundred and sixty-four days out of the year we only want one flag. That flag must be the Stars and Stripes. We want it waving from every home and every schoolhouse and every church and every legislative hall. But on the spring Memorial Day, we like to see the folds of the old Confederate flag for a little while wrapped about the folds of the Stars and Stripes which once battled with it. The Confederate flag is the emblem of many a heroic deed of the true American heart, as the United States flag is also the emblem of many a true heroic deed.

One Common Heritage

Oh, the bravery of the past, when the great armies of the North and the South were in mortal conflict! Did not the two armies then respect the bravery and nobility of each other, and bow in reverence to the heroism of their foes? At the siege of Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, the commanding general ordered the ninety-ninth regiment of Illinois Volunteers to charge a redoubt occupied by the second infantry of Texas. As the Northern regiment moved forward to the charge, the colonel gave the command, "Boys, don't look back. Keep your faces toward the enemy and charge." On and on went the line. Under the withering fire of the enemy the Northern regiment broke and retreated. But the color-bearer of that regiment, Thomas Higgins by name, was fleeter-footed than the rest. He carried high the flag in the charge and moved straight on. He did not know that his companions had turned back. He kept his face toward the enemy. And there he was, one Northern soldier with the old flag flying high over his head, charging alone a thousand men in gray. Then there rose the cry from the Confederate ranks, "Don't shoot him! Let the hero live! Don't shoot!" And so Thomas Higgins, the color-bearer, carrying the old flag of the Union, moved on, until at last the Confederate soldiers opened their ranks and swallowed him up and then sent him back again a free man.

If the brave soldiers of old could be so merciful to each other, can we not be just as forgiving to-day? The Northerners have given back to the Southern States the Confederate flags. By that symbol we say, "The war of 1861 has forever passed away." But to-day let us enter into another compact. Let the South to-day bring out her old tattered flags. Let the Northern soldiers bring out to-day again their old tattered flags. And let the ragged folds of these old banners be wrapped about each other, as North and South clasp hands and say, "We are brothers. We have the same government. We have the same land. And as one nation we will always live—blessing the common heritage of the brave deeds of the Boys in Blue and the Boys in Gray." Thank God for the day when the Northern States returned the Confederate flags captured in battle. By that act they truly and forever captured the Southern hearts in love. Yes, at last the North and the South are truly united and are one.

OCEAN GROVE'S NEW SPIRITUAL LEADER

WHEN, at its recent spring meeting, the Executive Committee of the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association was confronted with the duty of filling the it void left in its working force by the death of Bishop ies Newbury Fitzgerald, little debate was required to ire an enthusiastic unanimity of opinion on the part of committee. Luther B. Wilson, resident Methodist Episal bishop of Chattanooga, Tennessee, was fixed upon as man fitted to carry forward the glorious record of the ociation, and he was promptly appointed leader of the an Grove Camp Meeting enterprises during the summer 1907; this action is preliminary to the ratification of his ointment by the Association at its regular fall meeting. t is evident that in Bishop Wilson a man has been raised who is adapted by his forceful personality and his spiritual intellectual vigor, no less than by the physical equipit which belongs to the high noon of life, to take up the dership where his beloved predecessor laid it down.

Born in Baltimore, Maryland, on November 14, 1856, hop Wilson is now in the prime of his power for usefulness. was graduated from Dickinson College, and was admitted the Baltimore Annual Conference in 1878; three years reafter he found his wife in the Mount Vernon Place urch of his native city. Serving his conference acceptably, was made a presiding elder in 1894, and was elected fraal delegate to the Methodist Church of Canada in 1902. the last general conference held in Los Angeles, Calif., he was elected a bishop of his church, his force and originality leaving their impress upon the session.

Bishop Luther B. Wilson

Bishop Wilson's qualifications as a presiding officer give him a peculiar fitness for leadership; his impartiality and patience, aided by an exceptionally fine presence and clear voice, forming a combination upon which the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting is to be heartily congratulated.

THE ROYAL SPANISH BABY

FOR the first time in many generations the eldest child of the reigning King and Queen of Spain is a son, and the whole country is in a frenzy of rejoicing over the birth of the Prince. At one o'clock on the afternoon of May 10, the waiting populace were notified of the arrival of an heir to the throne by a salute of twenty-one guns fired from the grounds of the Royal Palace in Madrid.

The event appeals to the sympathies and sentiment of Spaniards in a degree difficult for the citizens of a republic to imagine. Spain is so torn with the revolutionary, Carlist and Socialist factions, that failing a lineal successor to Alfonso XIII., his own tenure upon the throne would undoubtedly become ultimately endangered, while his death would surely arouse sedition and revolution. It is, therefore, only natural that the arrival of a royal male heir should be regarded as an event of supreme national importance.

The moment it was announced that Queen Victoria had given a future King to Spain, ministers and grandees, diplomats and other officials hastened toward the palace in their gilded and emblazoned state carriages, in order to attend the ceremony of presentation which, in accordance with ancient custom, follows the birth of an Infante or Infanta of Spain. The effect of this procession upon the people was instantaneous. Everywhere business was suspended, and the crowds came pouring into the public square in front of the palace, uniting in wild outbursts of joyful emotion when a uniformed hussar appeared upon the steps of the palace, shouting that un chico (a little boy) had been given to the throne of Spain. Even the roar of artillery was almost deadened by the frantic cheering and the clapping of thousands of hands.

Following the custom of centuries, the royal babe, ensconced in a daintily cushioned basket, was placed upon a huge golden salver veiled in lace. The King, in full uniform and wearing all his decorations, his eyes filled with tears of pride and joy, then carried his firstborn son to present him to the officials of his realm. As Prime Minister Maura lifted the veil, the King said: "I present to you my beloved son, the Prince of the Asturias and successor to the throne of Spain," and the assembled guests walked past their King, who continued to hold the salver in his outstretched hands. The solemn dignitaries forgot all etiquette, and heartily cheered both King and Queen. At the close of this brief ceremony the Prince was taken back to his mother, where the historic cradle in which both his father and grandfather were rocked as royal infants, was softly draped in delicate pink silk and real old Brussels, to receive the present hope of Spain. little Prince showed signs of the utmost vitalit inherits his English mother's blue eyes and he complexion.

FOUNDED A GREAT MOVEMENT

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S maxims "Fit yourself for the work God has for you in this world and lose no time about it," and "Go ahead—do something and be willing to take responsibility," appeal to instructors of youth and Sunday School and church workers. The field is wide and the harvest is promising.

In 1890, Mr. Marshall A. Hudson, a business man of Syracuse, saw a big opportunity and a heavy responsibility, and started a young man's Baraca Bible class. He felt that the love and enthusiasm of young men was being lost to the church and that, by organizing them into a class in which they would have a feeling of proprietorship, he could best win them to Christ and the church. He has seen the divine approval in the conversion in that first class of two hundred and fifty young men of whom two hundred have joined the church. It was not originally intended, he says, as a world wide Baraca; but God meant it so. Many evangelical denominations are now forming these classes and the world-wide Baraca, as the National Union is called, is now found in every section of the United States and Canada. Over two hundred thousand members are enrolled, and Mr. Hudson, the busy merchant, is president without salary or worldly reward.

Young men wish to do things. They do not care so much to have things done for them, as to do for some one else. The Baraca idea originated with Mr. Hudson and eighteen young men of his city to help other young men into the higher life. They elected their own officers and teachers, and in the by-laws adopted appears the following sentiment, which has been adopted as the platform of the National Union: "Young men at work for young men; all standing by the Bible and the Bible school." With the Bible as its book, the class makes the Sabbath School hour its rallying time, and all the work radiates from this centre. The full control of the class is in the hands of the members, under the sanction of the superintendent. They elect a president, secretary and treasurer, and appoint committees for looking up new members, visiting the sick and finding employment for the idle. Much is made of prayer and sociability. A meeting is held of a week night in home or church, which begins with a prayer meeting and ends with social amenities and perhaps refreshments. The young men like to bring their friends as guests, who in turn become members and bring others. Their motto is, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me"(Phil. 4:13.)

Marshall A. Hudson

Baraca is a shortening of the Hebrew word Berachah (meaning happy or joyous or blessed). The idea is to make happy the young men who come into their circle. Over two thousand classes are thus enrolled and there is a strange enthusiasm among the members, as was seen at the recent National Convention held in Atlanta, Georgia. At this meeting Mr. Hud brought the greetings of the first class, sixteen years old, of which he is still teacher. His aim is a Baraca class in ev Sunday School. Some classes report hundred present at the Bible study hou

Eight years later was organized in same city the Philathea Class for yo women. The Greek word means "Lov of Truth." The aim is to stimulate am young ladies from sixteen to thirty desire for true Christian knowledge, create an interest in and to support Bible School, and to unite its member practical Christian sympathy and servi They have officers, also mottoes badges, and make a good deal of the cial side of the church's life. Indeed, Baraca and the Philathea frequently u in holding social evenings, and in uni ways endeavor to support the Bible sch Where one is started, the other soon org izes. In over 1,500 churches these pl have been tried and have met a big opp tunity in various denominations, and fil a well defined need of the young peo for Christian fellowship. W. J. P

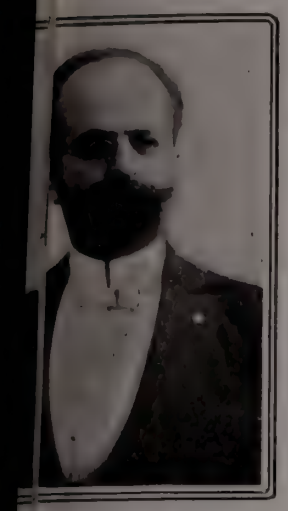
LEBANON'S QUAINT PEOPLE



Prince Bellama

LEBANON, "the White Mountain of Syria," stands so far from the beaten path of Oriental travel that it is known to but few besides scholars and missionaries, yet the place is among the most interesting in the East. Jeremiah speaks of the snow of Lebanon, and it was mentioned often by Greek and Latin geographers.

Among the snow-crested peaks of the range dwell the representatives of many tribes and religions. Their modes of life and dress are of an age that [illegible] other parts of the world. There are a few handi[illegible] but the people, for the most part, depend on [illegible] flocks and herds and the crops of their small [illegible]s. Robber bands infest the district and day [illegible]ght guards upon the stone towers scattered [illegible] the country watch for the coming of marauders, [illegible]otherwise, would be able in a quick rush to de[illegible] the vineyards, and drive off the flocks. Tribes of [illegible]ins roam the country, living as their ancestors did [illegible]sand years ago. They do not [illegible] what work is and scorn those [illegible]s who have a settled abode. They [illegible] a good part of their time in expe[illegible] against other Bedouins, or in [illegible] against the settled towns and [illegible]s. Of course, most of these [illegible] have been officially outlawed, [illegible]ey usually manage to repulse all [illegible]oops that are sent against them. [illegible] are feared, and men with prices [illegible] their heads ride their horses [illegible]gh the large towns without being [illegible]ed. They are always heavily [illegible], one marauder carrying at times [illegible]e, a long gun, a sabre and a pistol [illegible]. They live in tents, and during [illegible]mmer their life is enjoyable, but [illegible]nter, especially in January and [illegible]ary, the icy wind from the moun[illegible] makes the nomads' existence al[illegible] unendurable. Their own flocks [illegible]metimes a source of danger, as in [illegible]r, made desperate from the cold, [illegible] charge into the tents of their [illegible]rs for shelter.

[illegible]th the exception of one small sec[illegible] of territory, Mohammedanism [illegible] with iron hand throughout all Syria, and has [illegible]00 fanatical followers. Mount Lebanon alone [illegible]ts its independence of the Moslem rule. Those who [illegible]t the religion of the Prophet of Islam are chiefly [illegible]nites and followers of the Druze religion.

[illegible] the seventh century, the monk Maro built a convent on the bank of the Orontes and established a religion founded upon the traditions of the early Roman Church, with a Syriac ritual. At least one disciple of the Maronite religion has occupied a conspicuous position in Syrian government. In the twelfth century, the tribe Beni Koreish was favored by the Sultan Noureddin, who made them rulers of the principality. One of their descendants, the Emir or Prince Bechir Shehab, ruling Mount Lebanon through an agitated period of its history from 1789 to 1846, while avowedly a Mohammedan, was secretly a Maronite. One of Mount Lebanon's storied cedars, twenty-five feet in circumference and hollow, is used by the Maronites of the present time as a chapel.

[illegible]uze Girl in Festival Dress

So far as known the true cedars of Lebanon are found only in the valley of the Kedisha River, in the Lebanon range. Belon, who traveled in Syria in 1550, found twenty-eight of the cedars. In 1832 M. Lamartine said: "These trees diminish in every succeeding age. There are now but seven. These, however, from their size and general appearance, may fairly be presumed to have existed in Biblical times. Around these ancient witnesses of ages long since past there still remains a little grove of yellow cedars, appearing to me to form a group of 400 to 500 trees or shrubs. Every year in the month of June, the inhabitants of Besherai, of Eden, of Kandbin, and the other neighboring valleys and villages, climb up to these cedars and celebrate mass at their feet."

The Druzes' form of religion was not heard of until the eleventh century, and has never been a sect of creed or religious ceremonies, even a set form of prayer holding no place in its observances. Indeed, it is little more than a brotherhood for political purposes, with secrecy for its watchword, transmigration of souls for a feature of its doctrine, and Hakem for its prophet. Its two distinct classes are composed of the Okah or initiated, and the Yohah or uninitiated, who are absolutely ignorant of the secrets of their faith, but from whom implicit and unquestioning obedience is exacted. The Druzes, occupying the southern half of Mount Lebanon and extending inland on the Druze Mountains of the Hauran, are an independent race of fine physique and polished, courtly manners. They number not far from 125,000. But for all their fascination of manner and the beauty and seclusion of their women, their state of morals is low, divorce being so usual that at a recent wedding in a Lebanon village, almost every woman present had been divorced, one of them, like the Samaritan woman of old, having had five husbands. Upon what secrets the Druze faith is founded is not revealed, one of their rules being that he who discloses them to others outside the pale "shall be killed by all means."

No Latin Jesuit of the Middle Ages ever worked more zealously for the advancement of the holy church on the principle that "the end justified the means," than does the Okah Druze, who works in secret to attain his ends and receives the sanction of his faith for whatever he may do.

The Druzes have their headquarters at Mount Carmel, but followers of the faith are found in all the large cities of Syria, and some have found their way into Egypt. The Druzes all paint their eyelids dark blue. The bands of their turbans are always white.

The missionary world knows something of the spread of the Gospel in Syria. In Beirut, the Presbyterians have founded a college. The English Friends have both boys' and girls' mission schools and a hospital in Lebanon, and other evangelistic work is gradually making its way. It has remained, however, for a former leader among the old nobility and a descendant of the rulers of Mount Lebanon, to plead with Christendom in behalf of the aged and infirm mendicants who throng the market places and besiege the church doors all over Syria. Their half clad, enfeebled condition and piteous entreaties attract the attention of every traveler.

They have been the flotsam and jetsam of the Syrian population ever since childhood, knowing no permanent place of abode and without family or friends. In many cases their parents twisted an arm or a limb of their offspring. In some cases these unfortunates have but one leg on which to make their way over the rough country roads.

Prince Bechir-Shehab

The Syrian Prince Bellama, a graduated physician of the University of Lyons, France, has been delegated by men of position among his people to present the cause of destitute and worthy Syrians to Christians of the United States and Canada. The philanthropists represented by Prince Bellama, rich in spirit but poor in purse, desire to establish a home for the unfortunate Syrian beggars and destitute invalids who are roaming about the district from which King Solomon secured the exquisite interior woodwork for his temple. The Bellama stock originated in the Arab tribe of Beni Powaris, which immigrated from Aleppo in 821 A.D. They pitched their tents upon the side of the mountain, and as the population increased their skill in warfare and in government acquired for them the title of Mukaddameen, implying the possessor of power. In the sixteenth century one of these Druze sheiks, or chieftains, Hussein Bellama, gallantly winning the victory in a sharp engagement with an invader, received, in recognition of his valor, the title of Emir or Prince from the governor of the province, and the village of Beit Shabab was given him as a family appanage.

From this haughty Emir of centuries ago has come to us the living representative of his line, asking in the name of Christ for help for his suffering people. The committee who have projected this scheme for the betterment of the social conditions in their native land are looking beyond to the gathering of hungry and ailing old age into the fold of a sheltering home. Their needy class is so great that they form an actual profession with a system of passwords and countersigns which would put our most progressive "panhandler" to shame. It is believed that the establishment of a home conducted under methods borrowed from the highest civilization, may be the entering wedge which shall ultimately destroy the fakir organization and place ancient Syria's philanthropies upon a modern basis. They have made their plans for a building that will accommodate 160 persons; and while they ask aid from fellow Christians in other lands, they themselves are working with the expectation that at no distant day the home will be a reality. The Thinning Ranks

AS each Memorial Day comes around, the ranks of those who march with slow step and tattered flags are thinner, the number of graves to receive the tribute of flags and flowers is greater, and the Grand Army of the Republic has hundreds of battalions who are answering the roll in the far country. Memorial Day occupies a peculiar place in American life with its great lessons of patriotism, courage and obedience to the call of duty, and it is a hopeful sign that, as the veterans one by one are unable to carry out its military and religious ceremonies, the sons of those who fought are reverently taking up the custom and are decorating the graves of the nation's dead. To those who come from foreign shores, the exercises of the day should be made to teach a great lesson of what the flag means, and what the country stands for that has become theirs by adoption.

The day is one in which sectional bitterness has no part in either North or South. On one battle monument there is a single simple inscription, "Honor to the Brave," and in the same spirit in many places Union veterans escort Confederate veterans, and in turn the men who wore the gray march with those who wore the blue, to see that no grave, either North or South, is forgotten on their respective memorial days. This is an encouraging sign of the growing cordiality between the sections once torn by civil strife, and a sure indication that the old wounds have healed. Together they rejoice in a common country and a common flag. Their sons, wearing the same uniform, have shown that the valor of the sires has not diminished in the younger generation.

In the American forces of to-day, the sons of Grant and Sheridan and the sons of Wheeler and of Fitzhugh Lee are fellow officers; something that would have cheered the heart of that great American president who spoke with such prophetic vision when he said at Gettysburg: "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan; to do all which may achieve a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Our Distinguished Guests

IN heartily welcoming the gallant Japanese, General Baron Tamemoto Kuroki and his brilliant staff, New York has paid to him the high honors that rightly belong to the greatest foreign soldier who has ever visited these shores in modern days. The hero of the Yalu, and "the strong right hand" of General Oyama at the decisive battles of Liao-yang and Mukden, to Kuroki probably more than to any other commander in the Mikado's armies was due the masterly strategy and the bold, daring movements which made Japan victor in the war with Russia. He is a true type of the dashing, yet cool, calculating and resourceful Japanese soldier, and probably the best living example of the amazing progress his nation has made in military skill in less than half an average lifetime.

How American sights and scenes impress these silent guests of ours must be left largely to conjecture, as General Kuroki and most of his companions speak no language but their own, and their impressions must necessarily filter through an interpreter. What they think of our skyscrapers, our Broadway rush, of the polyglot multitudes of our great cities, of the constantly recruited army of aliens arriving at Ellis Island, of our elevated roads and our subways, of Wall Street and its frantic bulls and bears—their opinions on these and a thousand other sights peculiar to America will probably be unrecorded here. Though keen observers, they are not loquacious. It is evident, however, that they are enjoying their visit thoroughly, and that they feel they are among a friendly people, whose cordial relations with their native land have been practically uninterrupted throughout half a century. Their trip across the continent, their genial experiences at Jamestown and Washington, and the tremendous ovation in New York have convinced them that at heart America is the sincere friend of Japan, and that our people take the same pleasure in honoring Nippon's distinguished sons that the Japanese have shown to representative Americans visiting their shores.

May the gallant Baron Kuroki, with his high staff officers, Lieutenant Kigoshi, Major-General Umezawa, Colonel Ota, Lieutenant-Colonel Nagayama, and his train of captains, majors, sergeant-majors, intendants, and all the rest of the band of heroic sons of Nippon, find their American tour both pleasurable and profitable, and may they take with them, when they bid us farewell, vivid and delightful remembrances of the warm-hearted hospitality of their friends in the great republic of the West.

Russia's Hard Problem

IT is a difficult thing for those who live in a land where law and order prevail, and where the rights of the individual are secured by statute, fully to realize the value of these blessings.

This reflection comes to us as we read the published statement of Alexis Aladyin, the Russian peasant leader and ex-member of the Douma, who is now in this country. He points out the incongruity of Russia's professions of reform, in view of the fact that civil rights and freedom of speech are still denied there, and that in the thirteen months from January, 1905, to February, 1906, 14,654 lives were sacrificed to "Russian justice." Of these, 1,252 were condemned by drumhead court-martial (i. e., summarily and without even form of proper trial), 934 of whom were actually executed. Official reports acknowledge the number of victims to the revolutionary movement to have been 26,000 dead and 31,000 wounded.

Even eliminating political riots and civil disorders, with their sanguinary consequences, the record is a terrible one. It has no modern parallel, if we except the ruthless work of Turkey among her Greek, Nestorian, Armenian, Syrian and Bulgarian subjects. Every twentieth year, from 1822 to 1904, has witnessed a massacre of Christians in the Sultan's dominions, the total sacrifice of human life in that period aggregating over 214,000.

By way of Paris, the rumor comes that the Czar, impatient of making satisfactory progress, had decided arbitrarily to dissolve the Douma, and that the imperial decree had been drawn up and wanted only the royal signature, when British influence interposed and temporarily saved the situation. Whether such a critical stage has really been reached or not, it is by no means certain that the acute conditions may not recur at any time.

Russia has a long way to travel before the nation reaches that stage where comparative peace and comfort are enjoyed as the result of the recognition of individual rights. The Czar, Premier Stolypin and the Douma are wrestling with a mighty problem. They have the earnest wishes of the civilized world for their success, but that desired end seems yet far distant.

A Shallow Estimate

IT has been well said, and oft, that if one desires to win golden opinions, or indeed any opinion that is worth the winning, he must go outside of his own circle. There he is much more likely to encounter depreciation than appreciation. This applies, apparently, to all professions and callings alike, and we are compelled, after due observation, to admit that even the ministry is not an exception.

In a recent address read before a body of Presbyterians, the Rev. Daniel H. Martin, in pointing out "certain perils of the ministry," submitted the following as weaknesses to which the pulpit is prone, and which ought to be avoided:

> Sloth, a tendency to neglect systematic study; vanity, a desire for continuous applause, as though on the stage, and an especial liking for the title "Doctor"; selfishness arising out of the deference paid to his office until he becomes self-indulgent and demands as a right what is given only in courtesy; envy, especially as regards censorious remarks upon brother ministers; professionalism, a tendency to utter holy words without feeling them; ecclesiasticism, exalting his own little denomination above the great horizon of Christian truth; and cowardice.

Dr. Martin's criticism is a shallow one, and if it is intended as a presentation of existing conditions among any considerable portion of the ministry, we might add that it is misleading and of little value. Speaking from an experience extending over many years, and which includes personal acquaintance with preachers of all denominations, we fail altogether to see the pertinency or the justice of these charges. They may not be intended as a reflection on the whole profession, yet they have acquired this character in the public prints. Many publications eagerly seize any opportunity to belittle the pulpit, however undeservedly, and Dr. Martin has furnished the opportunity.

Our ministers are men like ourselves, with t weaknesses and propensities; but we gladly r

Our Japanese Guests

...M welcome was given by New York, on May 15, ...o the famous Japanese soldier, General Kuroki, ...h his staff came to the city after visiting the ...wn exhibition. A crowd of Japanese residents of the city met his train on its arrival and greeted their distinguished fellow-countryman. He went directly to the City Hall, where he received the greeting of Mayor McClellan, and thence to his hotel at which he held a public reception. In the evening commenced the series of celebrations which continued throughout his stay. There was strong curiosity to see the General, who is probably the greatest military leader that has ever visited our shores. He it was whom General Oyama, the Commander-in-Chief of the Japanese armies, described in his dispatches as "my strong right arm." Small of stature and clad in a plain tweed suit, it was difficult to realize that the quiet observant man had but a short time ago been at the head of an army that had administered to the Russian forces the crushing defeat of the Yalu and then, ...g them back in ignominious flight, fighting them ...ver they came to a stand, drove them to bay at ...ng. There, combining with the armies under ...als Oku and Nodzu, he continued his victorious ... and took the chief part in that brilliant battle ... effectually destroyed Russian prestige in Asia. ...espect paid him by our own officers vied with the ...e of his own countrymen here, and must have ...ced him of the appreciation of the world of his ...nd courage. ...noes Causing Terror

...orts from Italy indicate that there is grave appre...n about the renewed activity of Etna and Strom...he two volcanoes which are a constant menace to ...rrounding country. Recent cablegrams report that ...volcanoes have suddenly burst into activity. An enormous volume of smoke and quantities of red-hot projectiles are being thrown out from Etna in all directions. There are also continued loud explosions and earth-shocks. These latter are especially severe at the Etna Observatory, about half a mile from the chief crater. In winter this point is covered with snow and in summer with dry lava. The latest reports from Stromboli Island declare that the situation is still more terrifying. A few weeks ago Stromboli was covered with rich vegetation. Now the island is stricken and desolate, everything having been destroyed by fire or buried under ashes. Every boat at the island has been pressed into service by the inhabitants to aid in their escape from the danger. Around Etna, too, there is a panic among the population as the hot lava approaches their gardens and houses. It is astonishing that so many people are willing to live there, when at any time they may be overwhelmed; but such panics are speedily forgotten. Even the ancient people began again to worship the golden calf but little more than a month after they had stood trembling before the quivering Sinai with its thunderings and lightnings.

Ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven: with darkness, clouds and thick darkness. (Deut. 4: 11.)

A Child's Protector

There was distress in a home in upper New York a few days ago. A six-year-old child was missing and no trace of him could be found. Search was made in his favorite haunts, and inquiries were made among the neighbors, but no tidings of him were obtained. The mother was in terrible distress, going to places where he might have wandered and returning in hope of finding him at home. Evening was closing in and the child was still missing, when the mother's anxiety was relieved by the return of a yellow dog that had been with him and which was the boy's constant playmate. The dog entered the house and lay down as if tired almost to death. "That dog would never have left Willie unless he was safe," said the mother. She proved to be right. A policeman had found the child lying asleep by the roadside in Morningside Avenue. The dog was on guard and menaced the policeman when he attempted to touch the sleeping boy, but eventually changed his mind and realized that he must be a friend. He followed his charge when the policeman took him to a shelter and waited until the boy had been fed and put to bed and then started home to relieve the mother's mind. It would be well if the same confidence could be placed in Christians that the mother placed in that dog. With all his intelligence man often falls below the dog in fidelity to a friend. There are many now who are not faithful to Christ when his enemies traduce him, as in the hour of his earthly trial his disciples left him.

And they all forsook him and fled. (Mark 14: 50.)

A Flight From Fire

A press dispatch from Worcester, Mass., tells the story of a woman's daring and presence of mind. She with her husband occupied a lone cottage in the woods. Her husband was away on an excursion and she was alone in the house. There had been brush fires on the outskirts of the forest, but no one thought anything of them and did not suppose they would spread among the big trees. A sudden and strong shift of the wind caused the flames to rush down a grove, and though energetic efforts were made to check them, they were soon beyond control. No messenger was sent to warn the lady in the lone cottage, for it was supposed that she was away with her husband. Looking from a window, she saw an unwonted light and realized her danger. Not waiting even to put on out-of-door dress she rushed from the house, mounted her wheel and dashed at full speed down a narrow path lined on either side with fierce flames. After a half-mile sprint she was out of the woods and in a clearing, where she fell, panting for breath, from her bicycle. She was considerably scorched and frightened and says that the experience was a frightful one, but her life was saved by her pluck and quick action. It is a pity that when the soul is threatened with destruction, men are seldom so prompt to act. They are reluctant to leave property and friends, even when the voice of conscience, like the voice of the angel at Sodom, warns them that flight is the only way of salvation.

Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape lest thou be consumed. (Gen. 19: 17.)

New People in the Heights

A strange story is told by Dr. and Mrs. Bullock Workman, who have just returned from Kashmir in Northern India. Dr. Workman says: "My wife and I camped in the highest altitude attained by man, 21,300 feet. This was in the unexplored Minkum Range in the Province of Suru Kashmir. From our camps on a snow plain surrounded by seven towering peaks, we ascended to a height where I stopped to take photographs as the mist was increasing, while Mrs. Workman climbed to a peak 23,300 feet above the level of the sea." Their strangest discovery was that of a people of Mongolian type at a height of 10,000 feet growing rye, wheat, oats, and barley, and even at 12,000 feet they saw a village where human beings were living in huts with white goats, fowls, marmots, and strange animals. These people are not much above the animal in many respects. Living in isolation at that vast altitude, they have degenerated. The good inherent in man, of which in these days we hear so much, has not in this instance elevated him. The only elevating influence that can affect him does not come from his own soul but comes down from heaven, and without it he is liable to sink to the animal level.

Where there is no vision the people cast off restraint. (Prov. 29:18, R.V.)

Saved by His Finger-Tips

A strange coincidence was observed in a prison at Leavenworth, Kan. The police were looking for a colored man, a murderer named William West. While they were still looking for him a young negro named William West was arrested for a minor offense. He was promptly charged with being the long-sought murderer. He stoutly declared his innocence, but when he was measured by the Bertillon system it was found that he was of exactly the size and shape of the murderer. Only one test remained, that of the print of the finger-tips. An impression of them was taken and compared with that of the murderer's fingers, and the man was vindicated. It was clearly proved that he could not be the missing man. This was confirmed a few days later when the guilty William West was arrested. The coincidence of name and figure might have been fatal to the innocent man, if the impression of the finger-tips had not also been employed as a means of identification. The police say that this test is infallible. The impression of one man's finger-tips never corresponds exactly with those of any other man. The guilty man has thus reason to dread the test, while the innocent man rejoices in it. It is a solemn thought to those who are doing wrong secretly that the ancient patriarch represents God as applying a similar test.

Thou settest a print on the heels of my feet. (Job 13: 27.)

CHINA AWAITS OUR RELIEF SH

An Immense Flotilla will Distribute the "Buford's" Cargo Along the Grand Canal

WHEN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches our readers' hands, the famine relief ship Buford will be nearly at her destination, if she has not already arrived. She is followed closely by the second food-laden steamer, the Logan. Within a very short time both vessels will be in port. After reporting for inspection at Woosung, the port of Shanghai, the Buford will proceed up river to Chinkiang. Then the last great battle to drive back the forces of famine will begin in earnest.

Preparations for the distribution of the Buford's cargo have been made on an ample scale by the two Relief Committees. Arrived at Chinkiang, the flour will be transferred to a flotilla of flatboats, over a hundred in number, which will convey the life-giving food to all the points of suffering along the canal. From these places, the flour will be carried inland by various methods of transportation, the principal means being the old-fashioned Chinese wheelbarrow. A large force of helpers will assist in the distribution and especial care will be taken to prevent the loss of any of the flour through theft or undue exposure to the elements. As practically all the relief arrangements outside of Shanghai are in the hands of the missionaries, the same scrupulous care and conscientious thoroughness may be looked for in the distribution of the great cargo that have been a marked feature of all the relief work up to the present time.

Miss Reid, one of the missionary workers at Antung, writes describing the relief work in that locality. She says:

"The gentry and elders help daily and there is the utmost harmony and good-will on every side. We help from other sources as many families as we can from among those who have no one to do the portion of work assigned by carrying earth, or who are too weak to do so. But you must not for a moment imagine the help is anything like adequate to meet the need. It is not, and come what may, thousands must die. I feel we must first reconcile ourselves to this fact and do our best to save the greatest number we can. At present there are about 2,000 families here being kept from starvation, and Mr. Burgess is adding to these every day by fifties and hundreds. Two pounds per day is the amount of flour for each family. The very weakest earner can earn by carrying earth the price of two pounds per day, and as the money they earn depends on how fast they work, they do their very best. It is a treat to see them and to hear the patter of their feet."

Another missionary writes explaining the labor plan by which the strongest among the famine-stricken are enabled to earn money to buy their own food:

"We employed several hundred men to fill in a swamp with earth taken from the old bed of the Yellow River. Finding that this scheme worked successfully we employed a second gang of several hundred men making and repairing roads. Each man receives five cash per load. We estimate a man can make an average of one hundred and twenty cash per day, and he with his family can manage to get along on that. We do not allow women and children to do this work. Each workman has a distinctive badge which he wears on his breast. As far as possible, we endeavor to issue the badges to the most needy and we see that each workman has a flour ticket. So far, the scheme works satisfactorily, and moreover we have the sympathy and practical assistance of the officials and gentry here. As yet we have had no time to inspect the northern and northeastern part of the Hsien, where we understand there is dire need. We have more than we can do to keep the work going here, and the funds and supplies of food at our disposal do not warrant us in attempting to go outside.

"Much lime, burnt on the mountains, has been and is being used," writes another correspondent. "This gives work to hundreds and thousands. First in the mountains, then at the kilns, then the coolies it to market and the 'hong' men. The same the brick kilns seen all around. And the lab coolie now is only eighty cash to one hundre cash a day. In Chengchou there is much build on. The missions are buying and building."

These minor details afford an idea of the a the relief work in its various ramifications. I are many public works now going on on a mu scale. At Yaowan, for example, a river's being changed at a cost of $40,000, which is ment charge. Then the local gentry are c making liberal contributions in all the famine These facts, taken in conjunction with the ve relief campaign of the mi in charge of THE CHRISTIAN Fund, and with the now arrivals of limited quantities flour, and spring wheat, all to make the outlook brighter and more promising was two weeks ago.

It is still true, however, th are many places where the has not been materially relie ing mainly to the almost total of transportation facilities. As stated in a former issue of TH TIAN HERALD, an energetic ef be made to reach these out-of localities when the Buford ar

Writing of his visit to one remote neighborhoods, Capt (representing the Foreign Rel mittee at Shanghai), says:

"The people in parts of th area had never seen a white fore. They were intensely but there was an entire abs hostility. In one village th gregated in front of the vil in great crowds. Half of th starving. I was talking to t man, through my interpreter, was in a state of terrible di account of his people. I t lessly took a tin of biscuits own stock of supplies, and began to give them youngsters. In a moment, there was a wild men, women and children; and it was only by use of their sticks that my escort of soldiers and runners prevented me from being mobbed and smashed up, simply by the mad rush of hund starving human beings."

THE LAST OF THE MILLERITES

NEAR the little town of Preston, in southern Ohio, there has just passed away a Shaker named Henry Bear. With his death there passed the last of the famous band of Millerites, one of those who gave away all they possessed in hopes of the near approach of the second coming.

As he told the story, Bear "was one of the thousands of persons who, back in the forties, were converted to a religious wave that looked to the early coming of Christ. The 'Millerites,' as they were called, subscribed to this belief with much enthusiasm. Cincinnati had hundreds of believers, and like those of similar faith the country over, they gave away their goods and money. Then, attiring themselves in purest white, they mounted to the housetops to await the coming of the Lord.

"When the manifestation from above failed to appear, and the Millerites returned from the housetops, where they had prayed and sung all night long to the skies, which remained so unresponsive, they found themselves stripped of money and all earthly possessions. It was said by the more zealous that there had been a miscalculation, and instead of September 20, 1843, being the correct time, it was perhaps in the following October, or maybe in the following year, when all true believers would be caught up and transported bodily to eternal glory.

"Many of these believers came to Cincinnati, among them myself. Prior to that I had been a liquor dealer and distiller in the country. In preparing for the second coming of Christ, I collected as much as I could, giving the proceeds to many of the poorest of the Millerites, who had ceased to work notwithstanding their daily needs. As was said, I came to Cincinnati, and subsequently went on to Indiana.

Henry Bear

Last of the Millerite Band, recently passed away

"Later I received a conviction that I should sell worldly goods and go out in search of the Kingdom

"Despite my past experience, I sold my goods a values and came to the Queen City once again. proceeded to a house where Adventists were accusto meet and found three of the old Shakers—Elder Philip Joseph B. Agnew and Ezra Sherman. A cordial sy sprang up between us, and as a result many promine cinnatians, who had adopted Millerism, became mem the Shaker community. In time I became an elder village."

In connection with his demise, one of the local dail the following to say of this queer character:

"He walked the straight and narrow path and w died a few days ago, loving hands and grateful hearts in the simple tributes of the Shaker code.

"Mr. Bear was a man of striking appearance. H tall, thin and as erect as an Indian. His features we in a dignified mould; in fact, it was said of him that he counterpart of Lafayette. He wore his hair down shoulders. With his broad-brimmed hat well set on his his gray coat and large substantial trousers of the material and broad-soled shoes, with his person devo jewelry or display of any character, Elder Henry exercised a moral influence on the people of his comm and was known and respected by all who knew him had a considerable acquaintance among the mercha Cincinnati, for he assisted in purchasing from these mer supplies for the village."

JUDGMENT AND MERCY

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAF

THE message of God to Pharaoh, to be delivered by Moses and Aaron, was: "Let my people go." The determination not to do so was as adamant in the heart of Merenptah, the reigning Pharaoh. God knew that Merenptah had one vulnerable point, and that was his religion, which deified nature, and counted every form of animal life an object of worship. His grandfather had offered two vases of wine to a frog as "the sovereign lady of both worlds." Merenptah worshiped the Nile as the river god, the soil as the earth god, Seb; the sun as Ra; the atmosphere as Shu; the wind as Sutech. He worshiped also the bull as the god Apis, and Scarab, the sacred beetle.

Ten times it was necessary for God to wound him in his religion. The first attack was upon his river god, when its waters were turned into blood. The second plague, that of the frogs, was against the same god. The third, the lice, was against the earth god Seb. The fourth, that of the flies, was against Shu, the god of the atmosphere. The fifth, the murrain, was against the bull god Apis. The sixth, the boils, was against Sutech the wind god. The seventh, the hail and fire, was against Shu. The eighth, the locusts, was against Scarab. The ninth, the darkness, was against the sun god Ra. The tenth, the death of the first-born, was a just recompense for the killing of the Hebrew children.

A Contemporary Statue of Merenptah

After each assault, Merenptah would send for Moses, and say that he had determined to let the people go, and then he would change his mind, and bring on another judgment of God.

Picture the desolation of the scene at the end of the ten plagues; the banks of the sacred river foul and discolored; houses polluted and filled with foul odors of dead frogs; the fields stripped of every green thing; instead of animals grazing, dead carcasses lying about; trees thrown down and broken by hail, and burned by lightning. But the saddest of all was the mourning in every Egyptian home because of the death of the first-born. What a contrast was Goshen, where the Israelites dwelt, untouched by any of these afflictions. Hell and heaven seemed to be side by side.

It was the blood on the doors of the Israelites that saved them when there was death of the first-born in every Egyptian home. While the Egyptians were preparing to bear their children away to the tombs, the Israelites were preparing to take theirs away into a life of liberty.

Moses' Demand on Pharaoh

God's message to Pharaoh was, "Thus saith Jehovah, the God of Israel, let my people go that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness," literally, that they may sabbatize (Ex. 5: 1-9.) Through long years of slavery it is probable that the Hebrews had been deprived of their weekly rest day. Those toilers who have been deprived of this God-given right in our time speak appropriately of their "Sunday slavery." They are compelled to work one more day in the week than were the slaves of the South, who had one day in the week such a glad taste of freedom from toil that they sang, "Every day'll be Sunday by and by." Strange that in our Christian land so many should work as many days a week as the slaves of heathen Pharaoh, especially when Japan, and more recently China, have adopted the Sunday rest.

A good story comes from Shanghai, showing how by the appeal to reason many may be led to observe the day even when they have no adequate law to compel the suspension of toil. Mr. Robert E. Lewis, writing of the new Y. M. C. A. building there, says, "Great progress is being made on the Shanghai building; but they have been bound to work on Sundays, there being no municipal law or custom to the contrary. After attempts to prevent our efforts at pushing the building work from also encroaching on Sunday, but without success, Tsao and I went on the premises, called the foreman and guarantors together, and one hundred and twenty carpenters, masons and stonecutters, and went into a detailed explanation of Sunday and our relations to it. Tsao followed with prayer that the Great Spirit's True Son would prevent them from offending his laws, and that they would not cause us to utterly lose face. They talked it over and agreed to adopt our suggestion to work an hour longer every day, and to observe Sunday. The guarantors have posted up a notice on the front of the structure requiring all to observe Sunday, and the place is entirely deserted on that day. Thus what letters, architect's instructions and threats failed to accomplish, friendly discussion and prayer have done."

But Pharaoh would not let Israel go from their hard toil even for one day in the week. "Ye are idle, ye are idle; therefore ye say, let us go and sabbatize. There shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the number of bricks" (Ex. 5: 10-23). Every rejected call of God "hardened Pharaoh's heart," as it does to-day every heart that hears but does not heed the warnings that God sends. Some boys of twelve have heard more appeals to be Christians than their grandfathers in the days of monthly visits by circuit riders heard in a lifetime. "To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts."

Pharaoh's Heart

Four ancient Egyptian vases containing the viscera of Rameses II. came into the possession of the Louvre. The contents of three of them had been reduced to powder, and could not, therefore, be identified. The other contained a hard slab. French scientists had it sawed into sections and examined thin shavings of it under the microscope. These horny fragments showed muscular fibres in the formation found only in the heart and tongue. Hence, the conclusion is drawn that this 3x1½-inch slab is nothing else than the heart of Rameses II., who died 1258 B.C. It was his son, Merenptah I., of whose hardened heart we read in the story of the plagues. Both of them hardened their hearts by disregarding the rebukes of God and the appeals of their oppressed subjects. No less guilty are those who to-day disregard the appeals of God and man in behalf of the wronged and oppressed.

"I will redeem you with great judgments" (Ex. 6: 6). Let those who say when future punishment is discussed, despite the sure words of Christ, "God is too good to punish," take note that their theory does not work in this world, and they should not therefore trust it for the next. God has punished sins of individuals and nations with awful judgments, and we may well beware of "the wrath of the Lamb." Let us not only remember the beatitudes but also the plagues; for while God is merciful, God is also just. Indeed, a thoughtful man will see that future punishment is an essential part of a world ruled by a just God, for it is the supreme court needed to right the wrongs that escape all earthly courts. One might reasonably doubt the existence of a just God if the punishments of this world were final, if such tyrants as Pharaoh, to whom there comes no plague in this world, were to escape judgment altogether.

Walter Scott's Home

"But the children of Israel had light in their dwellings" (Ex. 10: 23). What a picture of Christian security are those slave cabins of Egypt that were on the bright side of the fiery cloudy pillar, whose judgment side brought midnight to the wicked and noonday to the righteous! Sir Walter Scott began his married life in a very humble cottage. With his own hands he made the dining-room table. Over the gate in front of the house he twisted the boughs of two willow trees; his wife and he came out in the moonlight and walked backward toward the house to observe the magnificence of their arched gateway. The splendor of Abbotsford afterward did not satisfy him more than the sweet simplicity of this cottage in which love contrived and strove for mutual enjoyment. Better a cabin with Christ than a palace with Pharaoh.

"When I see the blood I will pass over you" (Ex. 12:13). The Trull Homeopathic Hospital was afire. A clinic was going on in the operating room. An operation was half done. Fire or no fire, it must be finished. The patient was removed to another room. The hall outside was blazing. Water was dripping from the ceiling. Umbrellas were held over the patient. The operation was completed, surgeons working imperturbably, the nurses assisting imperturbably. The nurses and the pupils of the training-school hospital were absolutely brave and cool. They got the patients out. They thought of nothing but the patients. Not fire but death and terror were all about the Israelites that awful [illegible] as they stood calmly about the passover lamb, girde[illegible] their march from bondage, and secure because o[illegible] blood on the door.

You have forgott[illegible] surely." "No," said the artist, gravely, "I hav[illegible] forgotten the latch. I have not forgotten it. The [illegible] of that door is on the inside, not on the outside." [illegible] all know the picture, I am sure. It represents the [illegible] Jesus, thorn-crowned, knocking at a closed door [illegible] one hand, while with the other he holds a lantern. [illegible] door has not been open for a long time. He very soon grasped the way of salvation.

A few years ago a young girl working in one of t[illegible] mills in Leicester met with an accident. Her arm w[illegible] caught in a wool-carding machine and was very bad[illegible] torn and bruised. The doctors found that for so[illegible] reason the wound would not heal in the ordinary wa[illegible] Either, they said, the arm must be taken off, or livi[illegible] flesh from some one who would submit to its being [illegible] moved must be put upon the wound. The girl's moth[illegible] heard the decision of the doctors, and did not hesita[illegible] She was a rough woman, spending her life on a bar[illegible] going up and down the canal, but she had God's gre[illegible] gift of love in her heart. And my friend wh[illegible] told me this story and who knows both well, says th[illegible] the cure was complete. The sacrifice was not in vai[illegible] The wound was healed. The girl's arm was saved. [illegible] not this just a tiny illustration of "With His stripes w[illegible] are healed"? (Isa. 53: 5.)

How did the Israelites receive the command to sprink[illegible] the blood of the lamb on the door-posts? Listen at th[illegible] doors of a Hebrew cabin. The mother is reproachin[illegible] the father because he has brought no lamb for his hous[illegible] hold. The shades of evening are already gathering. A[illegible] midnight the destroying angel is expected, but the doo[illegible] of this house have no sign of the blood. He answers [illegible] "I have my doubts whether God ever really authorize[illegible] Moses to scare us with that story of the death angel. I am[illegible] not going to be frightened into religion anyhow. Eve[illegible] if the angel of justice comes, I have nothing to fear. WOMEN WHO LIVE IN DREAD

BROADLY speaking, nervous women may be divided into two classes—those who are really nervous, and those who imagine themselves to be so. Naturally, the second class is always in danger of drifting into the first, and very likely the woman who suffers from imaginary disturbances is more to be pitied than she whose maladies have an actual basis. The imaginative woman has nothing tangible on which to rest her ailments, but she nevertheless finds life a burden, and makes it so to other people. One has only to give the reins to a vivid imagination, and to be intensely self-centred, in order to fancy that she is a prey to every ill to which flesh is heir. To whichever class you belong, you will gain an immense victory over the trouble by eliminating the element of fear. To live in dread of some ill that may never materialize, to have the sense of a sword hanging over one's head suspended by a hair, to dread an epidemic, or poverty, or burglars, or a mouse in the closet, or a thunderstorm, and to let the dread get dominion over you, is to be worse off than you would be were you locked in a prison-house.

Fear is largely under personal control in its beginnings, but if it secure entrance into the mind, nothing is more difficult to rout. Where is the cure to be found for it? I think only in the words of our Lord himself: "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." That is, to give you royal dominion over all things base, mean and lurking; over all furtive things, over all things that sap the strength and take the courage away. Whoever has day by day a reinforcement of strength straight from heaven, whoever walks through this world hand-in-hand with the Elder Brother, will have royal dominion over fear; will, in truth, learn to fear nothing, except sin.

Another potent source of nervousness is worry. It has been well said that we may easily overcome the tendency to worry about ourselves and our own affairs, but that it is very nearly impossible to escape worry over our loved ones. Suppose, for example, that a dear one is hovering between life and death; suppose that a son or brother is in the toils of the tempter, or is harassed by contending circumstances; suppose a friend is to undergo a critical surgical operation; suppose a neighbor has met with reverses and calamity stalks before his door, and you, being fond of him and his children, are loath to see misfortune overtake them; suppose any number of things that in the ordinary current of human life occur to people with whom humanity has relations. How shall one of us do our share toward the help and consolation of those we love, and, at the same time, have no worry?

The answer to this is very simple. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." Cast there thy burden of care for the neighbor. There is One infinitely wise and loving, infinitely compassionate and infinitely resourceful, who can care for his children and bring them through every perilous pass. Of one thing be sure: Nobody was ever yet assisted to good purpose through the efforts of a worrying friend or relative. Worry eats into the tissues of the soul and unfits one either for clear thinking or decisive action. It is, besides, a prolific cause of nervous disease.

Still another hill against which to guard is undue excitement. An eminent nerve specialist not long ago said that he forbade his daughters to play any games or engage in any contests to which prizes were attached. He added that among his patients were a great number of society women who had been broken in health by the excitement of card-playing. Women who engage, they fancy innocently, in card-playing for charity, should make a note of this doctor's opinion. Many of us long ago came to the conclusion that there was risk of another kind, not to be ignored, in card-playing at all. But there are Christian people, unfortunately, who play progressive euchre and other games of the same sort that they may obtain money for hospitals or Fresh Air funds, and to them this word of warning is given.

Cheerful company tides one over many a nervous attack, but woe be to her whose friendly visitors regale her with stories of disaster, accident and sudden death in the circle of their acquaintance. Almost as much to be avoided are the friends who have long stories to tell of the illnesses they have had and the cures that were satisfactory in their case. It is a good plan not to talk about illness at all if it can be helped, not to dwell on one's own peculiar symptoms, and not to hear anything about what others have undergone. To put oneself in the care of a skilful physician, adhere to his advice, and obey his directions, is the wisest course. Having done this, trust with all your might in God, who works through means.

I may whisper to husbands, sons and daughters that, on their part, much gentleness, patience and tact are required in their dealings with those who are nervous. In nine cases out of ten, a little journey, the gratification of a wish that has been cherished, an agreeable surprise and the demonstration of real affection, will work wonders.

There are women in this land who have every earthly good except affection. Those around them indeed may love them, but they have fallen into the habit of repressing expressions of love, and denying the famishing soul that on which it could feed. There are too many husbands who take for granted the fact that their love is known to their wives, as there are too many wives who are chary in the same manner of telling their husbands their love. When the dear one dies there are flowers for the casket and flowers for the grave; but looking back, the family may remember that there have been very few flowers put in the living hand, and very little sentiment allowed to brighten the life of the home.

One word more. Never look upon disease as anything of which to be proud. You may have no reason to be ashamed of it, but it is not a possession of which to boast. Almost invariably disease is the result of broken law. You have either yourself broken the laws of health or it was done for you by your parents. God's plan of life for most of us is that we shall be well. A majority of our attacks of illness are not to be set down at the door of Providence, but at the door of our own mistakes. If we are ill, let us do our best to get well as soon as possible. If we are well, let us thank God for it, and by love, tact and forbearance do what we can to smooth the pathway of those who are less to be envied than we.

The Crown Princess of Roumania and her Daughter

THE pretty woman who married Ferdinand, the Crown Prince of Roumania, in 1893, was Princess Marie, a daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. She is allied by blood to several of the reigning families of Europe, and is as good and amiable as she is beautiful. Her children, one of whom is represented in the picture, are named Carol, Elizabeth, Marie and Nicholas—three little girls and a boy. She is the happy mother of sturdy and charming children.

Railway Accidents

We cannot take up the paper without reading the harrowing details of accidents at grade crossings that are practically unprotected by the companies that manage railways. A mother and daughter driving to a train to meet the latter's fiance, who was coming to spend Christmas at the home of his future bride, were lately killed at a railway crossing in New Jersey, the train rushing down upon them as they crossed the tracks at which, although they traversed a dangerous cut, there was no flagman or danger signal. A husband and wife were killed in similar circumstances the next day. The victims of such fiendish catastrophes are numerous, but, beyond a momentary horror, the tales of woe make little impression on the public mind. It is the same with the continual accidents owing to rear-end collisions, spreading of rails, accidental misunderstanding on the part of telegraph operators or occasional blunders made by engineers. To-day a popular railroad president and his guests are hurled into eternity. To-morrow a carload of passengers meets sudden destruction. It is impossible to resist the thought that safeguards are not sufficiently provided, that men are forced to work when over-weary and that commercial greed makes against public immunity from peril.

Indiscreet Speech

It is not so much hasty speech or unkind speech of which we stand in danger, as of indiscreet speech. Two friends, for instance, are sitting together engaged over a cup of tea in confidential talk. One of them happens to know something that she is sure would startle and surprise the other, if only she were at liberty to make an allusion or enter into details. Occasionally, moved by that desire to create a sensation that is almost universal and by no means confined to either sex, she drops a mysterious hint. Immediately the question she anticipated is asked, and if she be not extremely prudent, it is answered under the rose. Pledges are given that the confidence shall be respected and the secret go no farther, but a secret or a confidence once communicated to a third person is secret no longer. A bird of the air shall carry the news. A whisperer separateth chief friends. In business circles, in banking houses, in diplomacy, in affairs that involve financial or political interests, men are compelled by the instinct of self-preservation as well as by the laws of honor to observe the utmost discretion in speech. Women at home and in society need to practise an equal self-restraint. To the last degree it is humiliating to have traced to one's door a rumor or report that one would prefer to have no knowledge of and no responsibility about. Discretion is a pearl that all should covet, and that is the peculiar adornment of good women.

The Pope and the Bible

A Remarkable New Departure by the Pontiff, who now Advises the General Reading of the Gospels and Acts

THE official organ of the Vatican, L'Osservatore Romano (The Roman Observer), in its issue of January 30, 1907, contains an address or letter by the Pope to the Society of St. Jerome, which marks a new departure by the Roman Church with relation to the reading of the Scriptures. Heretofore, the general reading of the Bible, or any portion of it, has been discouraged if not absolutely forbidden by the Church of Rome, on the ground that it was improper for the laity to place its own construction on the Scriptures. This prohibition is still operative in many Catholic lands, and notably in the South American republics. It will be interesting to note how the new view expressed by the Pontiff in the address printed below will affect the situation in Catholic communities generally.

The Pope's letter is written in Italian and is addressed to Cardinal Cassetta, "Honorary President of the Society of St. Jerome for the diffusion of the Gospels." It says:

"To our Venerable Brother, Francis di Paola, of the Sacred Roman Congregation, Cardinal Cassetta, Protector of the Pious Society of St. Jerome for the diffusion of the Holy Gospels.

"Our Venerable Brother:—Greeting and Apostolic Benediction:

"We, who, since the time when Patriarch of Venice, blessed the Pious Society of St. Jerome, and conceived happy wishes for it, now, after a few years, looking at it from the Supreme See of the Church, find reason of high satisfaction, in seeing how, in such brief space of time, it has made so much progress and has brought such notable advantages. For with its edition of the Gospels, the Society of St. Jerome not only has overrun Italy so as to establish in the Peninsula three centres of action in order to reach the end more largely, but it has also penetrated into America, caring for the dispatching of its volumes wherever the Italian tongue resounds, and aiming to help especially the emigrants. It is certainly necessary to recognize that the fact of having published and spread among the people, with the guide of an opportune discernment, about five hundred thousand copies of the Gospels, constitutes a splendid proof of the extraordinary zeal manifested by the members in said enterprise, and of the very large sphere of action touched by the Society. These facts are evidently worthy of even much more admiration, because the means which the Society had at its disposal have been very limited; a fact also consoling and of good omen, if we consider the object intended by the institution, which proposes to offer to everybody the opportunity and facility to read and meditate upon the Gospel, in view of the special needs of our age, when, compared with other times, the avidity for reading is too great in general and not wholly without damage to souls; a fact also very healthful, not only in itself as one which brings us to the narratives of an all divine force, namely, to the story of the life of Jesus Christ, of which nothing could be conceived more eminently effective to inform us as to holiness; but also very helpful, chiefly because it renders a signal service to the magistracy of the Church, and because the reading of the Gospels prepares the souls to receive well the message of the Divine Word, and because when the sacred text has been read previously, the explanations of the parish priests will remain better impressed on the memory, and will ripen better. We wish to add that, considering the present times, certainly it is not the least advantage of such publications to be able to say that, in virtue of their diffusion, and of their consequent reading, the echo of the voice of God goes and makes itself heard even among those unfortunate persons who, through despair, or hatred, or prejudice, flee from any contact with the priest. This is a thing which, to our eyes, is of precious and very desirable usefulness, in so far as it gives us a way to obtain the salvation of souls; if not with the voice, at least with the books, and with the teachings, emanating from the life of Christ we heal the evils of society and of the individual.

"We well know with what care the Association of St. Jerome attends to its work; and therefore we deem it superfluous to give its members any recommendations and incitements to push forward with growing activity their initiative. But, if we wish the Society to make every day more propitious advances, it should keep ever present this maxim, namely—that of all the enterprises none is more useful than that which best corresponds to the inclination of the times, and that when a work, in the brief running of years, has so nobly affirmed itself in the field of benefits, it is necessary to redouble the efforts in order to favor it. Therefore, now that the Association has produced among the people so much desire for the reading of the Gospels, it must feed that desire and second it with the continuous increase of the copies of the same Gospels, well persuaded that such increase of copies will be crowned with advantageous result.

"It goes without saying that this fact will help also to rebuke the known prejudice, namely, that the Church does not wish to permit, or opposes, the reading of the Sacred Scripture in the vulgar tongue. And because it is of the greatest interest not only to have as an aim the prosecution of the aforesaid end, in preference to anything else which might come under the active zeal of the Society, but also that all the united forces may be converged in it, it will be also opportune that the Association of St. Jerome should retain as a sufficient fi labor to dedicate itself to the lication of the Gospels an Acts of the Apostles.

"To you, therefore, our vene brother, is left the promoting, the prestige of your authorit with the wisdom of your ac the increase of a work whic us is so much at heart. T members, then, it remains to cate themselves to the good o institution in the manner in they have dedicated themselv to this day, namely, with the est diligence and with the no enthusiasm. Since we have posed to restore everything in Christ, there is nothing we better desire than to intr among the faithful the custo the frequent or rather the reading of the Holy Gospels, cause this reading precisely der strates and makes us clearly se what way we can and must r to that desired restoration. auspices of the celestial graces as a token of our benevolence. impart very cordially in the I the apostolic benediction to yo the members and to all those will come in help of the Society

The Children's Paradi

THERE is no branch of Christ work which appeals more f ibly to the philanthropic sense t the care and happiness of the h less little children who crowd streets and dwell in tenement hou Who is not interested in childr Who does not delight to see th play, as well as work?

Let me give you a glimpse of gladness that came to me last s mer when I visited THE CHRIST HERALD Children's home at Mo Lawn, the paradise of the childr We thought as we looked around spacious grounds that the spirit the Master, who went about doi good, must have possessed founder and supporter of this w derful and saving work. If are to make people believe in Christianity, we must help th who cannot help themselves.

The scene upon the lawn wh I saw two hundred and fifty ch dren gathered from the tenemen of New York City, happy a hilarious, made one forget t hopelessness and despair of ma of the parents of these childre The whole scene was like a pi ture in a fairy book. Such a crowd happy faces, and Mr. Klopsch the happie of all, as he stood among them. H true it is that in making others happy, are made happy ourselves. Many a o who is tired of living an aimless, wast life, might bring sunshine into the wea homes of poverty and privation by helpi to send some poor child to Mont-Law for an outing.

Through the benevolence of generou hearted people a number of beautiful co tages have been erected, some of them the memory of loved ones who have crosse over into the Happy Land. A number beds have been endowed at $21 for th season.

The children's dining hall is spacious and commands a magnificent view of th river. The Amusement Hall above it a great source of pleasure to the little folk

I hear the question often asked, "Ho can we reach the masses and help them habits of cleanliness and thrift?" Certainly Mont-Lawn is answering this question b teaching the children who come there th meaning of clean bodies and pure hearts The beautiful chapel erected by Dr Klopsch is where the children gather for service of song and prayer, and where o Sunday afternoons they are taught th Bible and the way to Heaven. Can an ministry be more Christlike than this?

MARY BARTON COOKMAN.

THE MIKADO'S ENVOY HERE

Secretary Togo

BARON TAKEWO OZAWA, a member of the Japanese House of Peers, and one of the leading statesmen of that nation, is now on a visit to the United States. He comes as the special representative of the Mikado on a two-fold mission: to ascertain the prevailing feeling in this country toward Japan, and to express the thanks of his imperial sovereign to those Americans who extended practical sympathy and assistance to Japan during the great famine in the northeastern provinces. Baron Ozawa, who is a vice-president of the Japanese National Red Cross Society, is accompanied by Mr. Masatake S. Togo, A.M., secretary of the Red Cross. Mr. Togo is a relative of the famous Admiral Togo, the naval hero of the Russo-Japanese war. The secretary acts as interpreter for Baron Ozawa, who does not speak English.

In interviews which have appeared in the daily press Baron Ozawa has stated that he finds nowhere in this country, outside of San Francisco, anything but the friendliest feeling toward Japan. In his own land the United States has always been regarded as the friend, and indeed almost the ally, of Japan. His country has no dreams of further territorial expansion in the Pacific. Japan hopes the United States will continue to keep the Philippines. She does not wish them to pass into the control of any other power, as such power might prove unfriendly to Japan. Further, the Baron stated that Japan's finances would not permit of any extensive naval increase.

Baron Ozawa is deeply interested in everything that relates to philanthropy and systematic benevolence, and during his stay here he will inform himself fully concerning the methods employed in the conduct of our leading charities. This will probably include work among the poor and destitute of our great cities, charity work among the sick and helpless, hospital work, orphanages, children's fresh air homes, and slum work generally. As a leader in the great Japanese Red Cross organization, he is keenly alive to the importance of acquaintance with our quick and effective Western methods. Personally, he is a quiet, thoughtful-looking gentleman of middle age, but erect, vigorous, and well preserved. In speaking, his face lights up with geniality, and his whole manner is courtly and agreeable, yet with a quiet dignity and reserve. With the Baron's party there are also two other distinguished Japanese besides Secretary Togo, viz.: Mr. Uhei Nattow, of Yamanashi, a member of the House of Peers, and Professor Shouzaburou Kanazawa, lecturer in the Tokyo Imperial University, and Professor in the School of Foreign Languages of that city.

Baron Ozawa, after a short stay in the United States, will go to London to attend the Eighth International Congress of the Red Cross Society, to which he is accredited as the official representative of Japan. He has been vice-president of the Imperial Japanese Red Cross since 1902.

One of the objects of Baron Ozawa's visit to New York was to confer upon the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the decoration of the Rising Sun, by the special direction of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan, in recognition of Dr. Klopsch's services in the Japanese famine relief work, and also as a token of gratitude, through him, to his associate editors, the readers of this journal and all who were associated with them in the relief work. He also desired, as the representative of the Japanese Red Cross Society, to present to Dr. Klopsch a certificate of life membership in the society and the Japanese Red Cross decoration, as a further acknowledgment of Japan's gratitude for the service he rendered as the representative of the generous-hearted American people. An account of the presentation will appear in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

aroused from its apathy by an attack of a singularly malignant nature. A native newspaper published the statement that a native officer had been killed while on a hunting expedition for refusing to do some menial work and that the government had deliberately hushed the matter up. The article recounting this incident was written skilfully to stir up racial and religious excitement. It was proved not only that the officer in question had not been murdered, as the journalist said, but had been accidentally killed in trying to control a restive horse, but also that the journalist knew the fact when he wrote the article and knew that the bitter attack he was making on the government was based on a lie. This was not his first offense, and the authorities decided to make an example of him. They seized him in spite of his rank and popularity and removed him from his office. The act struck awe into the ranks of his followers, and the fact that he had been carried to some unknown prison, where he could no longer carry on his wicked and malignant agitation, paralyzed the movement.

It is not known how far these libels and misrepresentations have affected the masses of the people. There are, however, signs that many of them are aware of the designs of the plotters and dread the conditions which would prevail if the control of the British government were removed. At a recent celebration in honor of a former Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab the natives set up a triumphal arch on which they inscribed the words: "For God's sake save us from the rule of our fellow-countrymen." The words were reminiscent not only of the Punjab but of all India. The British have kept them from flying at one another's throats, and have delivered them from the oppression of corrupt officials whose extortions were worse than those of a Turkish vizier. But the populace is proverbially ungrateful and is moreover always liable to be carried away by a popular movement led by ambitious leaders animated by selfish motives.

It is a singular coincidence that this outbreak should have occurred exactly fifty years after the great mutiny of 1857. The movement, however, is of a different character. This upheaval appears to have originated with lawyers and teachers and to belong to the people. The mutiny of May, 1857, began with a rising among the Sepoys, natives trained to arms by the British themselves and in their pay, and only gradually spread to the masses when the deposed native rulers were made the leaders of the outbreak. It was a more formidable rising than this appears at present, because the Sepoys had control of British cannon and had been taught how to use them. Since that time there have been no natives in the artillery. It is believed now that the native soldiery are loyal, though of course they would be under strong temptation to rebel if the native movement became general.

The mere possibility of another rising in India causes a shudder of apprehension. The native Hindu becomes a wild animal when his passions are once aroused. That fact was abundantly proved in the mutiny. Beginning at Meerut on May 10, 1857, the Sepoys slew their officers and made their way to Delhi, which became the rallying point for the disaffected. The first success gave them courage and when they reflected that the British were not a fiftieth part of the whole population, they were hopeful that the whole foreign element might be exterminated. At Cawnpore they succeeded by treachery in isolating the women and children. These they imprisoned in one building and sent in butchers with axes to cut them to pieces. Not one human being escaped, but the floors, ankle deep in blood, and the fragments of flesh told the awful story to the brave rescuers who arrived too late to prevent the massacre. At Lucknow the women and a few soldiers and a number of faithful natives barricaded themselves, and after a long struggle with hunger and plague, were saved by Colin Campbell and his brave Scotchmen. Delhi held out to the last, but through the bravery of Nicholson and his little force, it too was taken. The history of that awful time reads now like a hideous dream. God protect India from such another experience!

It is remarkable that this widespread discontent should have manifested itself so soon after the great Durbar, when all India united in acclaiming King Edward's accession to the throne. Princes and people gathered from all parts of the country and vied with one another in enthusiastic loyalty to the new sovereign, and at that time there was no sign of the hostility to the British rule now prevalent. It may be that the new movement may be allayed, if tact and consideration are exercised. England is singularly fortunate in having at the head of her administration a man so judicious as Lord Minto, the Viceroy who succeeded Lord Curzon. His position is one of enormous responsibility, which he is well able to bear. In Gen. Kitchener, too, who is at the head of the military forces, the government has one of its best soldiers, a man who has done valiant service in many lands, and is at once prompt, vigorous and resourceful; a man with whom it is not safe to trifle. All that can be done to save India from the anarchy of self-rule he may be trusted to do; but we most devoutly hope that the preservation of India may not be dependent on the military force of her present rulers, but may commend itself to the people by the fairness and righteousness of the government.

General Kitchener, Commander-in-Chief

Questions and Answers

J. I. C., Holland, N. Y. A husband and wife deed their property to a friend. In case one of them dies, can the deed be legally recorded and transferred without the knowledge of the survivor?

If the deed was actually delivered to the grantee (the friend), it may be recorded without notifying the grantors or either of them.

R. T. M., Dundee, Mich. 1. Do the prophecies indicate that the Jews will be restored to Palestine at Christ's second coming? 2. Is there any passage of Scripture that states that the world will be converted before Christ comes a second time? 3. Will the reign of Antichrist precede the restoration of the Jews?

1. Students of prophecy are not agreed on the subject. The majority infer from various passages, that they will be restored before the coming of Christ in the second stage of that coming. The first stage, as you are probably aware, is thought to be in the air to summon those Christians who are looking for him, to meet him (see I. Thess. 4: 16, 17). The second stage is after the great tribulation when he comes to reign. 2. Finally "every tongue shall confess," etc., but there is no promise of it being before the second coming and it will probably not be before that event. 3. It is believed that Antichrist will assist or promote their return, which he will encourage by promising them his protection. It is this treaty that he will break in the middle of the seven years, or the week, as Daniel calls it (Dan. 9: 27).

M. B. R., Midvale, Idaho. 1. Is it correct to say "Rev. Brown," or should it be "Rev. Mr. Brown"? 2. Which of the following is correct: "We are going to have a social," or "We are going to have a sociable"?

1. "Rev." should be prefixed to the full name, thus: "The Rev. G. D. Brown." Neither of the forms you quote is strictly correct. The first is vulgar. 2. Second is preferable.

C. A. N., Stromsburg, Neb. 1. Was there any total or partial eclipse of the sun visible at Jerusalem at or near the time of the crucifixion? 2. Also, was there any unusual astronomical phenomenon, such as conjunction of planets or stars, that could be visible to the wise men of the East at or near the time claimed for Jesus' birth?

1. At the Saviour's crucifixion, there was no total eclipse of the sun; had there been, totality would have lasted only from three to five minutes, while the darkness lasted three hours. Total eclipses of the sun in any one place cannot occur oftener than once in 350 years. The last total eclipse here occurred in 1806. Let the fact be remembered that at the Saviour's birth there was a miraculous light, and at his death a miraculous darkness. Neither had any connection with astronomy. 2. This beautiful story, or rather both of them, are not well translated. Wise men should have been translated "righteous men," for they admit that they were going to worship Him. Wise men may be learned, and still be infidels. In my opinion, these Christian men had assembled a short distance east of Jerusalem for worship, and this miraculous light appeared (seen by no one else, and, having no name, was, of course, called a "star"), which announced to them the tidings that the Saviour was born. The light then disappeared, reappeared at Bethlehem, guiding the wise men to the house of Mary his mother. The account furnishes no evidence that any unusual celestial phenomenon occurred. They only had about half a dozen names for strange celestial lights, and all without names were called stars. Sun, moon, stars, lightning and rainbows were alluded to as such, but northern lights, solar and lunar haloes, shooting stars, comets and miraculous lights were called "stars." I have just been reading about Halley's Comet where it is called a star. We call Mercury and Venus evening and morning stars.

Marathon, N. Y. LEWIS SWIFT.

L. A. S., Shiocton, Wis. Who was the man mentioned in II. Corinthians 12, who was caught up into heaven?

The apostle Paul himself. He speaks of himself in the third person, having been accused of boasting. In the fifth verse he speaks of that experience as being a legitimate reason for glorying, but of himself he had nothing to glory in but his infirmities. The rapture was something done to him and so far from its being a merit, he did not know even whether he was in or out of the body. He gloried in it because it was of God.

E. R., Albia, Ia. Will you tell me the origin and purpose of "Children's Day" in as complete a manner as possible?

The General Conference of the Methodist Church, in 1864, preparing for the celebration of the "Centenary of Methodism" in this country, appointed a committee of six persons to raise a "Children's Fund," and as a part of the plan to observe a "Children's Day." In 1868, the plan was adopted by the General Conference, and printed in the appendix to the discipline of that year; in 1872 it was incorporated in the laws of the church. The Universalist Convention in 1870 made the second Sunday in June the day when the duty of every parish was to celebrate the baptism of children. In Methodism, later developments have set aside "Children's Day" as one on which the "Children's Fund" shall be used in securing higher education for meritorious young persons in the church or Sunday School. The day brings the children and youth of Methodism under the inspiring influence of a common service. And altogether it may be regarded officially as a Methodist institution, observed on the second Sunday in June.

J. S. Hand, Cold Spring, N. J. Is there any Scriptural authority for the story that John the Apostle was thrown into boiling oil, but came out unharmed and died a natural death at Ephesus?

There is no Scriptural authority for the statement. Tertullian, who wrote about 200 years after Christ, relates the incident. Polycrates, who was bishop of Ephesus, says that he died and was buried there. Irenæus, whose teacher was Polycarp, the friend and disciple of John, writes of his living at Ephesus in the time of Trajan in 98 A.D.

M. A., St. Marys, W. Va. How many of the children of Israel who started out of Egypt entered into the Promised Land?

Only Caleb and Joshua. See Numbers 14: 28 to 32, Joshua 14: 6 to 11, I. Cor. 10: 5, and Deuteronomy 1: 36 to 40.

Mrs. E. W. R., Fall River, Kans. 1. When was Pilgrim's Progress written and why was Bunyan imprisoned? 2. What was the cause of the massacre of St. Bartholomew and when did it occur?

1. In 1657, at the age of twenty-nine years, John Bunyan, being impressed with a deep sense of religion, formally undertook the office of a public teacher among the nonconformists in Bedford, England. In 1660 he was arrested for acting in defiance of the severe laws enacted against dissenters from the Established Church. Since he could not be induced to moderate his zeal, he lay in prison almost continuously until 1672, and there wrote his remarkable religious allegory. 2. The massacre of St. Bartholomew, in which about 30,000 Protestants were slain, occurred on the night of August 23, 1572. It was caused by the hatred of the Romanists, led by Catherine de Medici and her son, Charles IX., for the French Huguenots.

Brooklyn's 16-Weeks' Revival

VANGELIST JOHN A. DAVIS for sixteen weeks has been conducting a continuous revival in Brooklyn with six churches have been officially ected, but for which practically all of churches have furnished earnest work- The six churches are the Sumner ue Baptist, the Embury Memorial odist, the Janes Methodist, the Wash- n Avenue Baptist, the Hanson Place tist and the son Methodist.

Evangelist John A. Davis

r. Davis believes in open confession for ist. He makes the meetings informal social, and while he never forgets to ch a strong Biblical sermon, he aims ake both song and testimony promi- t. Often he has 200 and more testi- ies in a single meeting. One evening my own church, I saw 149 men go down aisles, and give their testimonies in t facing the audience, eleven of these converted then and there, many just re cently converted, and many others Chris tians of years' experience, who had at last found their voices.

Mr. Davis has with him a gospel singer, Mr. F. A. Mills, and a pianist, Mr. George H. Carr, both as intensely in earnest as Mr. Davis. Mr. Mills is unique in his manner, but never fails to gain in each church a devoted band of a hundred or more singers, who pray before the meeting and testify in it. One Sunday afternoon during the campaign, these choirs sang at the Majestic Theatre the songs of the "Pink Rose" service, while Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, the author of "Delia," told the story. A thousand people were turned away.

No one can estimate results. Hundreds were converted, but thousands in the churches have found new life and learned the secret of speaking for Christ, whether at a public service or in private. At every church, the climax of the meetings was to turn all interest back to the church and its pastor, and every pastor has felt that he is more strongly entrenched than ever in the hearts of his people.

Already arrangements are being made by the various pastors and committees of Brooklyn for the winter's work of 1907-8, with the hope that Mr. Davis and his associates may be kept here during the entire season in one continuous revival campaign.

Helping Young People*

VERY age has its own special trials and difficulties. The schoolboy is often told that his is the golden iod of life; the time when troubles are f and light compared with those that l come to him later. The statement may literally true, but it is not certain that implication is correct. The schoolboy, o is going up to his teacher, conscious t he does not know his lesson, feels very comfortable and knows that a very un- asant time may be ahead. Or he has en caught in some escapade and has to e the consequences. Looking back over from the standpoint of old age, even if as been a life somewhat full of trouble, old man realizes that his schoolboy ubles were as hard for him to bear as se of his manhood. There is a certain acity for suffering which is often reached youth as it is in maturity. The girl fers as much over her broken doll as her ther does over the loss of a diamond.

The first necessity, therefore, in trying to lp our juniors, is sympathy. A man who es a stand of superiority and tells his that his troubles are nothing, cannot lp him. The boy knows that his trouble very real and distrusts the consoler who nimizes it. A better course is to show m the right way to act and encourage n to take that way, though it may be inful. It is not always the best way even r a father who loves his child and would are him suffering, to lift the burden from m. It is good that he learn to bear the rden, to learn that wrongdoing entails ffering, and that not even a boy can irk a duty without paying for it. The oner that lesson is learned the better for e boy; but the teaching should be tactful d should not be administered while he is rappling with his difficulty. The lesson mes better when he is safely through.

We may help our juniors, too, by our example. Our teaching is of no use without that. It is often a surprise to a man to hear his son use a word that he has uttered in a hasty moment, and it is a humiliation to him when he reproves the boy to be told, "You used the word yourself." Young people are close and often shrewd observers. They notice how we act in emergencies, what is our habitual conduct, and they draw their own conclusions. We can help them best by closely following Christ ourselves, and proving to them by our lives the power of faith and love to support us in all the exigencies of life.

To Educate the Negro

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

I beg to thank you sincerely for your check representing contributions received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in response to the appeal in behalf of the Slater Industrial School for colored people at Winston-Salem, N. C., of which I am treasurer. The work this school is doing in uplifting and ennobling the colored people is marvelous indeed. It has absolutely eliminated all race spirit in its vicinity. The school grounds, buildings and appliances are worth $50,000. The white people raised $10,000 for a hospital for the negroes; the latter supplied the labor free. Thus they have a modern hospital for their sick, worth almost double this amount, in which colored girls are graduated as trained nurses. The trustees and directors of the institution, all leading white men, have induced the State and county to contribute $5,500 yearly for the maintenance of the institution. The influence of the school and hospital has been so widespread that the State authorities want to increase the plant, and now promise $12,000 in addition to the yearly grant, if the trustees will raise an equal amount. With $24,000 cash in hand for material, the colored people will do the work free, as they did in building the hospital, thus increasing the value of the plant $48,000. A New York philanthropist will give half of the $12,000 when the other half is raised. Thus the raising of $6,000 means $48,000 to the institution. Seldom do we see a donation multiply eight times when it becomes bricks and mortar, as in this case.

I believe your readers will cheerfully help when they know their gift will multiply eight times. The trustees can then meet the offer of the State, and increase the capacity of the school $48,000. Thanking you for your kindness in behalf of these colored people, WILLIAM A. BLAIR, Treasurer.

Pres. of Board of Health

"What shall I eat?" is the daily inquiry the physician is met with. I do not hesitate to say that in my judgement, a large percentage of disease is caused by poorly selected and improperly prepared food. My personal experience with the fully-cooked food, known as Grape-Nuts, enables me to speak freely of its merits.

"From overwork, I suffered several years with malnutrition, palpitation of the heart, and loss of sleep. Last summer I was led to experiment personally with the new food, which I used in conjunction with good rich cow's milk. In a short time after I commenced its use, the disagreeable symptoms disappeared, my heart's action became steady and normal, the functions of the stomach were properly carried out and I again slept as soundly and as well as in my youth.

"I look upon Grape-Nuts as a perfect food, and no one can gainsay but that it has a most prominent place in a rational, scientific system of feeding. Any one who uses this food will soon be convinced of the soundness of the principle upon which it is manufactured and may thereby know the facts as to its true worth." INTO STILL WATERS

ALL the anger and defiance fled from Maggie's face. Into her eyes crept a look of puzzled wonder. Away back in her memory there seemed to be another such a kiss—two, three, many of them; but where? When? Who gave them? Maggie was still puzzling over all this when it came time for the evening prayer to be said, and again those faint, far-away memories came to her. When had she knelt like this before? When had she said those words? Sometime—somewhere—and the sweet-faced woman of her dreams—she was there too; and—

Then it all fled, and Maggie knew only that she was very tired, and that it was wonderfully cool and comfortable between those smooth white sheets on the little bed.

CHAPTER XIV

FOR the first two days of that stay at Mont-Lawn Maggie was ever on the alert for a paste-pot or its equivalent to be set before her. Her keen, swift-glancing eyes took prompt inventory of every new thing presented for her inspection, and her sharp little tongue demanded the reason for every act she was requested to perform.

Gradually, however, the gentleness, love and happiness all about her did their good work, and the last vestige of suspicion and distrust fled, leaving her stunted, warped little soul free to unfold like a flower in the sunshine.

A strange thing happened then. The child seemed suddenly to come into her own. The old pertness, selfishness and naughtiness fell from her like a discarded garment, and she became almost at once gentle, sweet and lovable. Even to the teachers she was a puzzle. Other little girls had shown improvement—and great improvement, too—but there was never one like this; never one who seemed so naturally to take upon herself the gentleness of manner and speech that the teachers tried so hard to impress upon the children from the very first.

To Maggie herself it was like a dream. She seemed to be living in some half-forgotten world known long ago. She was convinced now that this wondrous pleasure time was a gift, pure and simple, and the thought filled her little heart almost to bursting with love and gratitude.

And what wonderful days they were! There was the early awakening in the morning with the song of the birds in one's ear, and the joyous call from some other little bed farther down the line. Later would come the morning song of thanksgiving, and the bountiful breakfast which always tasted so good. Where the long hours of the happy forenoon went to, Maggie never could tell; but with the swings, the swimming-pool, the seasaw, the walks and frolics and merry games—there was never any time to hang heavily on one's hands.

Immediately after breakfast Maggie always felt that she could never be hungry again; but when the noon bell sounded there were the long tables laden once more, and there was her own stomach clamoring for the good things upon them. Maggie never grew tired of seeing the boys gather in front of the big main building at the sound of the bell and take their places two by two, only to separate into the two long lines at another stroke of the bell, while she and the other girls marched down between the lines and into the Dining-pavilion.

Before eating there was always the grace to be sung with its sweet refrain "God is great and God is good," and frequently there were other songs, too. Then came the long bright afternoon with its romps and its games, and with perhaps a story or two, or a new song. Even rain did not dampen the fun, for there was the big play-room over the pavilion which made a rainy day an absolute delight.

After supper there was the song service in the beautiful Temple, with perhaps some one to talk to them, sing to them, or show them stereopticon pictures on a great white screen; all of which was very wonderful to Maggie, as well as to Patty, the twins, and the rest.

Then came bedtime hour, and Maggie used to think sometimes that this was the very best of all. Always there was the dear teacher to sing to them, and to tell them of the good Jesus who loved them so well, and always there was the bedtime prayer in the hush of the long, quiet room. For Maggie there was something else—never anywhere was the sweet-faced "dream lady" so near and dear to her as at this hour, and never did she seem so real.

It was a very different "Mag of the Alley" that, when the ten days were over, stood once more in the Grand Central Station on the way back from Mont-Lawn. The thin little cheeks had grown brown and plump, and the shifting, suspicious eyes looked at you with clear, honest joyousness. The tattered and faded dress had been replaced by a pretty blue and white gingham, and the eager little dancing feet were in neat shoes and stockings. No wonder the people in the station stopped and looked, for Maggie was but one of many, and all alike were tanned and joyous.

All the way home Maggie had been thinking, and it was just before they reached the little basement room that she told Patty and the twins her Great Idea.

"You know them three dollars that we saved to go to Mont-Lawn," she began eagerly.

"Yes," said Patty.

"Well, you know we never touched it at all 'cause we couldn't agree what to buy."

"Hm-m, yes," murmured Patty.

"Well, I've got it all fixed," declared Maggie, jubilantly. "Let's carry it down to the Missionary lady to take some one else to Mont-Lawn."

"But she said she wouldn't take it," objected one of the twins.

"She said they didn't take it from us children. You told us so yerself."

"Pooh! that was when we wanted to buy our own Mont-Lawn," retorted Maggie, airily. "Don't you see? It'll be just the same as anybody else sendin' it in—rich folks, and all that. Ain't we rich? We've got three whole dollars!"

"Hm-m, yes," acknowledged Patty, and the twins nodded silently.

Thus it happened that a certain City Missionary the next morning found tied to her doorknob a small brown paper parcel which, upon being untied, revealed a dollar bill, and a quantity of nickels, dimes and pennies. On the brown paper itself was scrawled in Patty's best hand the message Maggie had dictated:

"To take some one else to Mont-Lawn. We are rich so pleze dont refuze the munny."

CHAPTER XV

MRS. KENDALL'S illness after that second fruitless search for her young daughter had been very severe. Once more the doctor's buggy made daily trips to the Kendall homestead, and once more old Nathan sat flicking flies from the mare's back out in front of the great stone lions, while inside the house an anxious-eyed man gazed into a pale face framed in golden hair.

The doctor was worried. Physically his patient was better; but mentally—!

The old bitterness had returned to Mrs. Kendall's eyes, and the old listlessness to her movements. In only one respect was she unlike what she had been when recovering from that other sickness months before; she accepted now the doctor's visits without question, and for that much the man was grateful.

"My dear Mrs. Kendall, will you not here was no answer. Mrs. Kendall turned her face quite away. Five nutes later the doctor walked with ed head down between the big stone s on either side of the steps.

Home," he said briefly to Nathan.

t home the doctor was still plunged eep thought. Even the good supper his faithful housekeeper set before was sent away almost untasted, and r supper his cigar went out half ked. At last the doctor squared shoulders and addressed the opposite l.

I'll do it—and, God helping me, I'll ceed! It's not pills and powders she ded, but a vital interest in life—and t she must have, or die."

he doctor went about his task in as stematic a manner as if it were a y, not a mind, that he was treating. had diagnosed the case and written prescription; he now proceeded to minister the remedy.

Day by day as he called at the Ken- l residence, he dropped a word or about some lone woman on a bed of ffering, or some crippled child doomed a life of pain. Again it would be of brave fight of a handicapped man, of the wonderful patience of an aged man in the face of a lingering death. ttle by little he forced his patient's nd to dwell on something outside of rself; little by little came his reward the shape of an occasional gleam of erest in the sombre blue eyes.

It was then that the doctor entered on the second stage of the treatment. s patient was convalescent; she needed tonic—he spoke now of what untold y one woman with time and money at r disposal could bring into the lives the aged woman, the crippled child, d the handicapped man.

It was a long, hard struggle, but in e end the doctor won at least a meas- e of success—Mrs. Kendall gave some int show of interest in life.

For the doctor, however, there was w a new factor in the case. In striv- g to do for his patient, he had done r himself—to him had suddenly come most vital interest in life—it con- rned a slender, pale-faced woman with ir hair and blue eyes.

The doctor was disturbed—seriously sturbed. He had not intended to arry. His heart, mind and life should given to his profession, so he had en wont to think; now his heart, mind d life, and even the profession itself, emed none too great an offering to lay the feet of that same slender woman.

Nor was this all. That Mrs. Kendall ould listen for a moment to his suit, e doctor doubted. For months he had en merely her physician; he was that ill, with the added honor of being con- dential adviser in the new activities at his own efforts had brought about. They drove together, it is true—but it as to visit some sufferer on a far-away illside. They walked together—but ly when the sufferer lived nearer me. They talked together, and here gain were the earmarks of the doc- r's efforts to bring into her life a vital terest—Mrs. Kendall talked of what she wanted to do for the lone woman, the crippled child and the handicapped man. And in none of these could the doctor find encouragement for the new and vital interest that had come into his own life!

It was in the early part of September that Doctor Spencer made a hurried trip to New York, and it was in the Grand Central Station that he ran across the crowd of happy children, each with a bundle and a bouquet of wild flowers. Always now he noticed children when in the city, and always he looked for golden curls and a pair of blue eyes that might remind him of a familiar face. He saw nothing now to do but that; but as he watched the children he grew strangely interested in their sunburned, happy little faces. After a minute's hesitation he stepped up to one of the young women in charge, raised his hat, and asked a question or two. When he turned away some minutes later there was a bill in the young woman's hand which had been left with a request to "give the tots a glass of ice-cream soda apiece."

That night on the roomy veranda just beyond the big stone lions, Doctor Spencer told his friend all about it—that is, all save the bill and the soda.

"They had been to Mont-Lawn, it seems," he said.

"Mont-Lawn?"

"Yes, a children's home up the Hudson a little way, where the poor little tenement waifs may have a ten-days' outing free. It costs three dollars for each child, and the money comes from all over the country, the care-taker said. She told of one particularly pathetic case. A friend of hers is one of the city missionaries, and the story came from her. It seems there were three or four children who had been to Mont-Lawn, and who knew what a delightful place it is; and it seems that they had saved up three dollars among themselves. Nothing would do but this three dollars must be used for Mont-Lawn, so they did it all up in brown paper—all the pitiful little dimes, nickels and pennies, and one crumpled dollar-bill—and tied it on to the missionary's doorknob. Then, evidently fearing that some question would be raised about it, they wrote on the paper: 'We are rich, so please don't refuse the money.'"

"The little dears!—but how did she know from whom it came?"

"The young woman told, but I don't remember. I believe the missionary had seen that same lot of money before, or something of that sort. She said that the pitiful part of it all was that the little things probably didn't know where their own next meal was to come from—yet they signed themselves as 'rich'!"

"Doctor," cried Mrs. Kendall, sharply, "when I realize that my own little Margaret may be suffering for just such a ten days in the country, and with this great house hungering for her, I think I shall go mad. Isn't there something that I can do? that I can give? Can't I help toward this home? Tell me more about this Mont-Lawn. If I can't reach Margaret, I can reach some other poor little waif, perhaps."

All that he knew of Mont-Lawn the doctor told most gladly, nor did he stop there. Afterwards he procured still further information, and before the month was out he had sent on the twenty-one dollars necessary to endow a cot for the season in one of the dormitories. Over the cot was to be placed a picture of a five-year-old girl together with the card bearing the words, "In loving memory of Margaret Kendall."

A Christian "Captain of Industry"

MANY books have been written and printed in recent years dealing with remarkable instances of material success in life, and the daily and weekly press has held up to popular admiration men who, by virtue of tremendous energy, concentration and self-denial, have accumulated great fortunes in business. It is a pleasure to turn from the contemplation of success in the mere sordid, worldly sense, and to study the careers of those who, with Christian principle as the solid bedrock of character, have won their way to the hearts of multitudes of their fellowmen and have come to the front by virtue of moral and spiritual qualities which, when happily combined with a talent for business, compel universal recognition.

A typical Christian "captain of industry," Alanson D. Brown is a successful man of business, a great organizer, a brilliant strategist — but first of all, a man of positive Christian character, who believes that his duty to his Maker must come before all other considerations, and that it must permeate and control every action of his daily life. Three centuries of sturdy Christian ancestry were the heritage with which young Brown started out on his career. He was a farmer's boy and his naturally good physique was strengthened by plenty of wholesome farm work. He was born in Washington County, New York, in the township of Granville, on his father's farm. The rounded tops of the Green Mountains were in plain sight on the east, and the rugged peaks of the Adirondacks on the west. It was an ideal American home, where many a boy would have thought it no hardship to spend his life; but Alanson D. Brown had pioneer blood in his veins and soon left these peaceful scenes for the struggle and conflict of the great world.

Mr. Alanson David Brown

His early activity was that of the normal hard-working country boy. His energy and activity were cultivated by judicious stimulation, and they have remained as distinguishing characteristics of the man.

Boyhood over, every moment was crowded full of preparation for the active struggle of life. After a course in the commercial college at Rutland, Vt., in which young Brown stood at the head of a class of one hundred and twenty-five, at the age of nineteen he started on his first really serious business venture—a trip South to sell a bunch of sheep which he had bought with his hard-earned savings. After an eventful trip to Mississippi, he turned his fine sheep into the pasture of a relative of his uncle, from which "they broke out and wandered off and were lost." Those were the troublous times at the close of the war and many a larger venture was wrecked from similar causes. Thus ended his first business experience, leaving a down-hearted but not discouraged boy to begin the fight again.

This he did, by starting in as a clerk in a drug and grocery store at Middle Granville, kept by a Mr. Kincaid, at the modest wage of seventeen dollars a month. When asked if Alanson was a good clerk, Mr. Kincaid answered, "There never was a better. He never left anything undone." Here he stayed until he received an offer from his uncle, Charles Brown, of Columbus, Miss., to go as partner and clerk in his grocery and provision business. Again his power and aptitude for business developed at once. Although a Northerner, by his tact and attention to business he overcame sectional prejudice and made friends everywhere. He found the firm doing business under old-fashioned, "long time" methods, by which it had met many heavy losses. He introduced the strictly cash system and took practically entire charge of the business. The first year, the young man's share of the profits was $6,000. Rev. J. H. Cason, of Royse City, Tex., Mr. Brown's first pastor, wrote of him at this time: "He impressed me as an unusual boy, in that he was absorbed in the business of the store. I never saw him take a minute in pastime, looking or conversation on the street. He went and returned in a hurry. In the store he watched for customers, and his bright, sunny face made him the favorite of the country people. He took an intelligent interest in the business."

Soon after coming to Columbus he became a member of the Sunday School, a regular attendant and close student of the Scriptures. Mr. Cason wrote: "I said to him, 'I want you to take a class of seven girls about thirteen or fourteen years old.' With tears in his eyes, he said, 'Brother Cason, I am not a Christian. I cannot tell those girls how to be saved.' I said to him, 'There is no Christian in the church that takes as much interest in the Sunday School as you do. You can be a Christian.' He took the class. A foot-note in the question books directed the teacher to call the name of each member of the class and ask, 'Do you trust in Christ as your personal Saviour?' All said, 'No.' One of the little girls said, 'Mr. Brown, do you trust in Christ as your personal Saviour?' He came in tears to me and asked to be relieved of the class. I said to him, 'You can put your trust in Christ now and settle the question.' He went home with me; we prayed and examined the promises. Soon he told the class that he did trust in Christ, and it was not long before most of the class, if not all of them, followed him in trusting. From this point the deepest impression of his heart was the praise and honor of God."

But young Brown was not destined to remain a country storekeeper. In 1871 he went to St. Louis as a delegate to the Southern Baptist Convention. He was greatly impressed with the city and concluded to give up his growing business at Columbus and move to St. Louis. January, 1872, found him in St. Louis, free and with a draft for $13,000 in his pocket. Christian "Captain of Industry" ever will give up." All through the the firm continued to send almost orders to the manufacturers in Bos- nd Lynn, accompanied by the cash, when the storm was over, their credit soundly established. By 1879 the ness of the firm had grown from $225,- o $1,500,000.

eanwhile, Mr. Brown had married Ella Bills of Waltham, Mass., daugh- of a prominent shoe manufacturer, and ome life was fairly begun. Since that his successes, business, home and ch, have moved forward with steady gress. During the past year his com- manufactured and sold eleven million lars worth of goods, the greatest amount sold by any shoe concern in the world ne year.

hese business successes were not at- ed by any legerdemain or by frenzied nce, but by a steady application of old-fashioned principles of honesty fair dealing, united with rare energy business ability. The imposing struc- which stands on the corner of Twelfth eet and Washington Avenue, St. Louis, ne of the smallest units of the great tem of which he is the founder. There six huge factories, employing 5,000 ple, with a capacity of 48,000 shoes ly—over one shoe a second—and a enth factory is in process of erection. market this product requires a net- rk of distributing points all over the ited States. Here, in a simple office, marked by pomp or ostentation, Mr. own makes his headquarters, counseling, vising, directing and constantly in touch h all the heads of departments, and en with their humblest assistants.

The care of his employees—the physical nditions of light, air, ventilation, and en food and companionship—are worked t in all of Mr. Brown's great factories an extent which makes a position in one them more desirable for a young man woman than such positions usually are, even than a clerkship in a store, for ample, which many a young man might efer. Nothing gives him so much pleas- e as helping forward young men who tch the spirit of thrift. Scores of them ve succeeded by ingrafting into their es his spirit and methods, and being irred by the force of his straightforward, ell-ordered Christian life. He is never o busy to listen to any suggestion of erit from whatever source. Some one as said that "the best government in the orld is a benevolent despotism." Mr. rown has established a combination of bsolute rule and co-operation which seems be unequaled for its efficiency, and the nthusiasm which animates every employee the youngest member of the force. In he great central office a wonderful system f bookkeeping prevails, by which the rogress of each day, each hour and almost ach minute is accurately ascertained. These figures are posted on bulletin boards where all can see them. The names of he salesmen who make the best record or each day, month and year are also osted. The same graphic statistical nethods are seen in the different factories. Thus the progress of the institution be- omes a matter of personal interest to very employee.

In his selection of men Mr. Brown eems to be guided by an almost unerring nstinct. Certain definite rules govern is choice, however, and these are such as o reduce the chances of failure. In se- ecting men he takes first those of positive Christian principles, of temperate habits nd of a frugal, saving disposition. With- ut these characteristics, no young man eed apply.

It has not been accident or luck that as enabled Mr. Brown to procure the est help in every department of his great industry, but a remarkable personal knowledge of detail, combined with rare tact, business sense and a keen judgment of human nature. Once admitted, every young man is impressed with the fact that he is in close touch with "the head of the house" and has Mr. Brown's cordial sympathy, so long as he takes an active and energetic part in the business.

The affairs of the institution are managed by a board of directors, who represent every department. Every member of this board has a voice and part in the weekly meetings. The sales force are brought in from all parts of the country twice a year, given a two weeks' course in shoemaking, and urgently requested to give their own experience, so far as it bears on the policy of the house for the ensuing year. This semi-annual meeting is a remarkable one in many respects. The democratic simplicity of it, the vivid American energy and enthusiasm that relieve the occasion of all dulness, and the warm sympathy and co-operation between employer and employed, all mark an advance in industrial and social methods more striking even than the astonishing totals of business done.

Alanson D. Brown's big-hearted Christianity permeates the great body of men whom his genius for organization has brought together into a working unity.

Yet, though he has made a brilliant success in commercial life and has become the founder and head of the greatest business concern of its kind in the world, he has by no means devoted himself to a money-making career for the mere sake of wealth. He values it only for the opportunities it affords for well-doing on an extensive scale. His wealth is indeed a trusteeship, to be managed for the glory of God and the benefit of humanity. His benefactions have multiplied with the years, and his life aptly illustrates the Bible saying, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings." Stanch and orthodox as a churchman and ceaselessly active in religious work, a liberal contributor to many benevolences, including missions, sanitariums, colleges and orphan homes, beloved by his thousands of employees, many of whom have risen under him to positions of trust and affluence, he is a typical example of the Christian merchant prince, who dispenses his gifts with lavish hand, yet wisely, and who has long ago realized that "there is that scattereth and yet increaseth." He has read well and understood the lesson of life. He has grasped opportunity firmly and made it his servant for the noblest purposes.

THE PORT OF PEACE

STRANGE when a God-created soul is bent
On clinging to this frail and mortal tent,
Its shaking tenement of crumbling clay
Already showing signs of swift decay;
And hence, with vain adornments 'tis bedecked,
Now and anon, to hide some ill defect:
Then calmly dreaming on of taking ease,
A few more years of vague uncertainties,
While storms most pitiless around it blow,
And threaten soon to lay the structure low,
Yet with tenacious grip to life it clings,
While Time a harvest of destruction brings;
'Twill struggle on, nor yield until it must,
When stakes and tent-poles lie low in the dust.

Alas! what strange infatuation this
When angels beckon from a world of bliss?
St. John on Patmos isle, the seer bold,
In panoramic splendor did behold
The golden city, with its pearly gates—
The home each weary pilgrim soon awaits,
'Mid fadeless flowers and fields of living green.
Ah, me! what ravished soul once having seen
Enduring habitations built by God,
Would turn back to its miserable clod?
Then blow, ill winds; what though the craft I sail
Doth tremble in the wild increasing gale;
So ye will bring my soul a glad release
When safely moored within the Port of Peace.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Centre of the Labor World*

RARELY is an author's preface written with more skill than is the foreword which Hutchins Hapgood has prepared for his recently issued book, entitled The Spirit of Labor. No student of the industrial conditions which exist in the United States to-day will read this preface without looking forward with zest to a perusal of the book proper. When Mr. Hapgood undertook to give to the intelligent reading public a comprehensive and strictly truthful presentation of "the world of the workingman," he recognized that no man, were he a Solon, could accomplish it with success, if he made his observations from the outside. There has been too much theorizing, too many impressionistic drawings of a life that must be felt in order to be depicted. The conditions, the ideals, the broad humanity underlying the labor situation must be absorbed, not observed, in order to grasp, both intellectually and sympathetically, the vigorous personalities, the class rebelliousness, the difficulties and the creeds of the labor world.

To this end Mr. Hapgood shaped his course. In his search for a man who should occupy a sufficiently typical position in the labor world to warrant his being made the "human document" from whose pages general deductions might be drawn, he went to Chicago, where labor is most riotous and where the workingman has created an all-pervading atmosphere of democracy. Beginning his study in the saloons and in the homes, he proved himself to be possessed of the first requisite for his purpose—he knew how to wait. It was only after several months that he met a man who in temperament, character and experience seemed thoroughly fitted to sit for the composite photograph of his class. Impressed with the intellectual vigor of the man, with his free habit of mind and the rough health of his personality, Mr. Hapgood plainly outlined to him the work he had planned, and secured his co-operation. Upon this friendly partnership is based the book under discussion.

For three months the author lived near by his "type," visited his home, met his friends upon terms of equality, attended meetings with him, and listened to the informal, but none the less weighty, arguments and opinions of his companions, thus coming to occupy an acknowledged place in the circle of his radical friends. The author-student's Chicago experience left him swamped by the richness of his material, and sent him back to New York, there to select and eliminate, but never to decorate or to "touch up" the records he had obtained.

"Anton," the peg upon whom the author hangs the individuality of the representative workingman, is a woodworker, an important man in Chicago labor circles, chosen by his constituency as their delegate to the International Labor Congress. Introductory chapters, "Early Youth" and "On the Road," are racy descriptions of the life of a lad of the people, free from the trammels of conventionality and unhampered by moral law. Then comes a reactionary "Age of Reason," with marriage and a readjustment to the industrial conditions of a great city. The Trade Unions, their Organizers, and the Radicals among them, are dealt with exhaustively and with an illuminating pen. Mr. Hapgood digs to the very roots of anarchism, and his study of the labor leader is worth appending:

> Corruption is a subtle thing; one not always easily recognized by the unreasoning man. To keep clear of wrong requires intelligence of a high order, as well as good will. And the labor leader is subjected to temptations of a kind not easily seen as temptation. By virtue of these he often becomes far less fundamentally attractive than the class he represents.
> Several sets of circumstances bring about this degeneration, for it is degeneration, of the labor leader. As he acquires the feeling of power he tends to adopt some of the worst methods of politics, and encourages the growth of a public feeling often extra- if not anti-legal. Several men in Chicago have said to me things which indicated an apologetic, or even exculpatory, attitude towards leaders convicted of bribery and other forms of graft—a kind of sentimentalism, rather than sentiment, for the cause. They often acquire a rather unscrupulous willingness to adopt the unjust methods of their opponents. Demanding fairness and charity, they are often inclined to show little of these qualities. I have seldom met a class of men who are, in some ways, as narrow-minded and as prejudiced as the typical labor leader of the "political" type.
> But this is not the worst. Narrowness, suspiciousness, an eager tendency to accomplish good results unscrupulously, if necessary, this is natural enough to men of little preliminary training and not often of the best natural quality—for the best men do not, as a rule, come to the top. And the essential justice of the cause outweighs mere money dishonesty, if the spirit be otherwise right.
> But worse than all these in its results is the moral change due to a different standard of life. The labor leader lives well. He spends well. He drinks, and develops the luxurious needs of the class he is combating. "I must spend fifty cents for my lunch, at the very least," said an admirable carpenter to me. He gets in a habit of mind where he will no longer work at his trade, even if he gives up a position which ought to be merely temporary. He becomes a "professional" leader. Like the "professional" politician, he tends to become inferior morally. He loses sympathy with the class from which he has sprung. Living no longer as they do, he no longer genuinely feels their needs. On the contrary, he is likely insensibly to attempt to live still better, insensibly drifts in feeling into the class supposedly hostile to the class he officially represents.

Withal, the book is impressive in its sincerity and is alive with the seething spirit of labor, working out toward the light. It is written with a serious force, which should recommend it to the searcher after truth in present-day problems.

The Vivians, by Edwin Barrett Hay, is a posthumous work of some merit, and is significant of better things to come had its author's literary career continued. Birdcraft, by Mabel Osgood Wright, has attained its seventh edition, an excellent proof, not only of the capable manner in which the author presents her facts, but of the popular interest in the general subject. Price $2. The Macmillan Company, New York and London.

It has remained for a Japanese, but a Japanese educated by American methods, to discourse learnedly in print upon the Powers of the American People, Congress, President and Courts, According to Evolution of Constitutional Construction. Masuji Miyakawa, D.C.L., LL.D., the first Japanese attorney ever admitted to the American bar, and a member of the faculty of the University of Indiana, has prepared an exhaustive treatise which should be included in the reference library of every American citizen. Contrasts in Social Progress, by Edward Payson Tenney, A.M., is an authoritative classification of facts to which many years of trained mental application have been given. The five great religions that sway vast populations of different nationalities, are analyzed and compared by a scholar who has thus made a valuable contribution toward the practical settlement of controversial questions in comparative religions. The mass of facts is clearly defined and arranged. It includes a presentation of the contrasts, under the various relations, in civic and domestic conditions, education, literature and moral thought. Mr. Tenney's deductions from these facts could only have been reached by a man of the ripest culture, and form a work of enduring value. Longmann's, Green & Co., London, New York and Bombay. Pp. 415. Price, postpaid, $2.70.

FLY TO PIECES

The Effect of Coffee on Highly Organized People

"I have been a coffee user for years, and about two years ago got into a very serious condition of dyspepsia and indigestion. It seemed to me I would fly to pieces. I was so nervous that at the least noise I was distressed, and many times could not straighten myself up because of the pain.

"My physician told me I must not eat any heavy or strong food and ordered a diet, giving me some medicine. I followed directions carefully, but kept on using coffee and did not get any better. Last winter my husband, who was away on business, had Postum Food Coffee served to him in the family where he boarded.

"He liked it so well that when he came home he brought some with him. We began using it and found it most excellent. While I drank it my stomach never bothered me in the least, and I got over my nervous troubles. When the Postum was all gone we returned to coffee, then my stomach began to hurt me as before and the nervous conditions came on again.

"That showed me exactly what was the cause of the whole ttouble, so I quit drinking coffee altogether and kept on using Postum. The old troubles left again and I have never had any trouble since." "There's a Reason." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Our life has a new beginning, a new birth; we are born again; and this, through the blood shed and believed in, is the beginning of all things to us.

The message concerning the lamb was individual, although it was to "all the congregation of Israel." They must "take to them every man a lamb, according to the house of their fathers, a lamb for a house." Only in the case of a family being too small, two neighboring families might share their lamb. It must be without blemish, it must be a male, it must be one year old, just fully grown. And that night was to be a night of death in Egypt, a night of judgment which would eclipse all the terrible judgments which had preceded it. Death was to reign in every house throughout all the land of Egypt. But for his own people God would provide a way through death to escape death.

All the congregations of Israel must slay their lambs and eat the flesh before the fatal blow should fall upon the Egyptians, and then the moment of their unparalleled consternation should be the moment of deliverance to the people of God. But before the flesh of the lamb was eaten, every head of a family must take the blood of his lamb "and strike it on the two sideposts and on the upper doorposts of the houses."

Skilled Workmen*

GOOD advice was this that the aged apostle gave to young Timothy. He would have him thorough, "a workman needing not to be ashamed." This young man was a minister, but Paul would have given the same advice to him if he had been in any other calling. There is a great deal of difference between a man who is master of his calling and one who is inefficient. Not only is there a difference in his position in the world, but in his own character and bearing. Howsoever humble the position may be, there is a certain satisfaction in performing the duties of it thoroughly. "I remember you," said an aristocratic officer to another who had worked his way up, "I remember you when you were only a drummer." The other looked at him without shame and answered, "Well, did I not do my drumming well?" After all, that is the main question as to any of us: Are we doing the duties of our station efficiently? Not whether the station be high or low.

No man believed more thoroughly in the power of God's grace than did Paul, yet here we have him telling the young minister to "study." There are some men who pray earnestly that they may succeed in some undertaking and make no effort to succeed. The young minister, if any one, might have expected that God would do everything for him; but Paul does not encourage him to such dependence. Pray by all means, look for divine help, be fully conscious that success is impossible without that—but study. God will help, but he will not help the lazy man. The man who sits down at the foot of the mountain and prays that God will carry him over it gets no answer; but if he begins to climb God gives him added strength. The young minister must study and God will give the blessing.

There is encouragement here, too, for the ambitious man. Promotion comes to him who is doing well the duties of his station. The fact of his being efficient in his humble work is a recommendation to a higher call. The spirit of thoroughness, of conscientious performance of duty, may be expected to go with him into a higher station. It is an unconscious pledge that promotion is justified.

Questions and Answers

I. I. M., Natchez, Miss. Is it a historical fact or simply a romance that Queen Isabella pawned or sold her jewels to raise the money to pay the expense of Columbus' voyage of discovery?

A recent historian declares that the money was procured by St. Angel, the confidential servant or secretary of the Queen, from Gabriel Sanchez, treasurer of Aragon, and it is asserted that at Simancas, Spain, there is still in existence the original record showing that 1,140,000 maravedis "were to be repaid for the sum advanced by St. Angel for Columbus' voyage." As the money was apparently taken from the official treasury, there was apparently no need of hypothecating the crown jewels or the private jewels of the Queen to procure it.

A. P. F., Aransas, Tex. In what does the Christian conception of God differ from Pantheism?

Pantheism regards God as present in everything. Christianity, too, believes in his omnipresence, but that is an omnipresence of energy, not of substance. A mere blind force operating throughout nature is very different from that of a personal God who governs, who loves and is in paternal relation with his creatures.

A. R., Sykeston, N. Dak. Can you give me a few facts about the life of John Randolph?

He was an American statesman, born in Cawsons, Chesterfield County, Va. He was a lawyer, but devoted his attention to politics. In 1799 he was elected to Congress and again in 1814. He was Senator from 1825 to 1827. Later, he was a member of the convention to revise the constitution of Virginia. He was also for some time in the diplomatic service. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., on June 24, 1833. He was called John Randolph of Roanoke, from the name of his ancestral seat. We are unable to answer the second question you sent. Ask some physician.

Reader, Safe Harbor, Pa. Is it right to put money in bank, in view of Christ's warning against hoarding? (Matt. 6: 19.)

In present conditions it is right to make provision for future emergencies. If all Christ's commands were obeyed, and men were always willing to give or lend as others had need, we might do without such provision. Your experience must have shown you that old age, sickness and death coming on men who have made no such provision find them in bad case. The prohibition of Christ was against that greedy hoarding which argued a lack of faith in God's care. The treasure of Palestine that the thief might steal and the garments that the moth might eat were the instances of hoarding that Christ condemned.

M. O. A., Perrysville, Pa. Will you please inform an anxious inquirer how to get any value on some currency that has been partially burned?

You should send it, with your name and address, to the United States Treasury Department at Washington. No matter how mutilated a bill is, if more than three-fifths of it can be put together, it will be redeemed at its face value. If it is possible to identify between two-fifths and three-fifths of a note, a system of redemption at half value has been devised. Fragments under two-fifths, except where the loss of the missing parts can be unquestionably proved, are not redeemed.

G. G., Amite, La. As we are not under the law, why should we refrain from work on Sunday, and why should we regard the day as sacred?

In other words, why should we do anything to please God if we are not compelled by law to do it? You remind us of an answer that Disraeli gave to a man who asked him why he showed so much devotion to a wife so much older than himself. Disraeli answered, "I am afraid I could not make you understand why. You are incapable of understanding what gratitude means." There are people similarly incapable of understanding what a service of love to God means. Do you suppose we were set free from the law that we might live as we please? We are under the higher law of love which, properly understood, is more rigorous than any other law. Christ pointed that out (Matt. 5: 20). The Lord's Day should be ten times more sacred to the Christian than the Sabbath was to the Jews. On that day he commemorates Christ's resurrection, an event infinitely more important to him than God's resting after his labor of making the world, which was the reason assigned (Ex. 20: 11) for the Jewish Sabbath.

F. M. B., Greenville, S. C. I am much interested in plant growing and have followed the work of Luther Burbank, the "horticultural wizard," from the beginning. Is he able to change the color of flowers by the "crossing" process, and how long does it take?

In the last twenty-five years Burbank has experimented with nearly half a million trees and vegetables, and upwards of 100,000 other plants. But even he cannot permanently change the coloring of a flower in any marked degree by the crossing process in less than a quarter of a century. There is a new art of coloring flowers, which has become popular with decorators, florists, etc., by using aniline dye solutions. Inserting cut flowers in these solutions will, in a few hours, produce many novelties totally different from the originals. Potted plants are carefully taken from the soil and the roots placed in the dye. Within twenty-four hours, hyacinths, tulips and many other decorative plants are given striking and unusual colors.

N. S. H., Kennett, Mo. Some people contend that frogs and fish come down with the rain. Is it a known fact that they do?

We have read of cases where they have been drawn up, either in waterspouts or tornadoes, and have fallen to earth at a distant point. It is pretty well understood that such things do happen, occasionally.

H. H. S., Detroit, Mich. Was not the prediction that the Jews would be restored to Palestine fulfilled when they returned from Babylon under Ezra and Nehemiah? Is it at all likely that they will again be gathered there?

The prophecies indicate another restoration, when Israel, the Northern kingdom, will return, with Judah, the Southern kingdom. This was not fulfilled when the Jews returned under Ezra. Zechariah, who wrote after the return from the Babylonian captivity, is most explicit as to a future restoration. (See Zech. 12:7; 14:11; 10: 6-12; Isa. 60:21; 66:20; Ezek. 20:40-42.) The prophets in these and other passages say that this restora is to be permanent. They cannot apply to the re from the Babylonian captivity and are therefore unfulfilled.

Rev. Edward J. Young, of Bartow, Fla., writes us the definition of predestination given in these colu on May 8 is liable to be misunderstood. The Calvin doctrine, he says, is that "God's electing love is the pri cause of man's salvation, which is not conditioned u foreseen faith, or good works, or perseverance, but upon God's sovereign grace. . . . Reprobation m simply this, that God's general benevolence is not in sistent with his allowing some to be damned for t sins, and the sentence of condemnation for those sins part of God's eternal decree."

W. C. C., Dakota, Ill. 1. Did not the Northern Army wear blue uniforms in the Civil War? 2. Do the Southern sold and their widows receive pensions?

1. Yes; blue has always been the regulation unif for the government troops since the Revolution. Br is now used for field vice, but blue is alwa worn for dress unifor 2. King Alfonso Presenting the New-born Prince to the Grandees of Spain

The day the son and heir of the King of Spain was born, the ambassadors, officers of state, and the chief nobles were summoned to the palace. They were in full court costume, their coats glittering with stars and medals. The king appeared, bearing his son on a silver salver, and as he passed around the assemblage, every one bowed low in honor of the sovereign and future king. King Alfonso said: "I present to you my son, the Prince of the Asturias."

A Magistrate Inflicting Punishment

TO OPEN UP THE "HERMIT KINGDOM"

Marquis Ito

WHILE General Kuroki and his distinguished staff of Japanese military men have been receiving a round of honors and ovations from Americans during their tour of this country, attention has been momentarily directed to another famous son of Nippon, the soldier-statesman Marquis Ito, at present resident-general in Korea, the "Hermit Kingdom." Marquis Ito, in a recent speech at Seoul, the capital, rebuked those who favored the adoption of a "selfish policy" toward the subjugat-

Koreans. He spoke in a vein which disclosed the fact t there is a strong resemblance between the Japae attitude toward Korea and that of the United States ard the Philippines. According to the cable dis-ches, he said that "no policy that s entirely selfish was ever success-," and he urged Japan to further interests of other countries in rea as well as her own. The great tesman's plea for a liberal policy l an "open door," may be accepted voicing the real purpose of his ernment with regard to that nation secure whose independence was one he principal objects of the late war. Mr. William T. Ellis, whose letters m the East have frequently appeared these pages, has been traveling and down in Korea. He repreits the people as helpless in the reme and as completely prostrated the results of the war. The one peful sign, at the present time, is growing friendship between the ple and the Christian missionaries, whom the former are turning as to ir best friends and advisers. Even king himself, limited as his powers urally are by the results of the war l the unavoidable military occupan of the country, which would otherbe left defenseless, has learned depend more upon the advice of the sionaries than upon his unstable ive counselors. Not long ago, when there was a plot against him, in which the whole palace was more or less involved, and when threatening Korean crowds assembled outside, it was to the missionaries he clung for safety and protection.

Dr. C. C. Vinton, of the Korean Mission of the Presbyterian Board, writes from Seoul to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the missionaries are pushing their Gospel work "with might and main." His whole letter breathes of energy and progress. Other missionaries tell of the wonderful advances the truth is making in the "Hermit Kingdom." Men of high station, magistrates, merchants, and peasants are becoming serious inquirers. Colporteurs are distributing large numbers of Gospels in the native tongue. Advantage is taken of market days to do effective work, which tells over large districts. Street preaching is done in cities and towns with good results. Missionary Hugh Miller writes of a magistrate who visited the missionaries:

"He stopped and addressed the crowd and recommended them to 'do this doctrine,' as he believed it to be a good one. He owned a Bible, which he had read, so that the Gospel story was familiar to him, though as yet he did not 'do the doctrine' himself. The neighboring prefect is an earnest Christian and on a recent visit urged this gentleman to become one. He had been much impressed also by the fact that a man named Chang, who had seemed to be the ringleader in every evil work in the county and had given him no end of trouble, had been converted and was now living a quiet life, trying to earn an honest living by cultivating a small farm he had secured. 'Anything that could work such a change in such a man must be a good thing,' and so he exhorted his hearers to 'do the doctrine.'"

All the missionaries unite in hopeful reports of the spread of Christianity. Little groups and congregations are springing up in towns and villages. There are, however, still many localities where the name of Jesus is yet unknown.

As an illustration of the needs and opportunity of medical and missionary work in Korea, the Rev. J. L. Gerdine, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, writes:

"The whole east coast of Korea, north of Fusan, is without a hospital or even a room in which in-patients can be received. Often patients come to Wonsan from great distances. Recently an old man walked about four hundred miles to see the foreign doctor at Seoul."

All the diseases that flesh is heir to are found among the Koreans. Surgery is wholly unknown. They believe that disease is caused by a demon that enters the body, therefore they most frequently use a needle in order that the evil spirit may find an exit. These punctures are made in the body in any place, with utter disregard to the anatomy, even including the eye. The Korean medicines include all kinds of charms and inert and poisonous things—tiger bones, bear claws, excreta, spiders, wasps, venom of snakes, etc. A foreign physician would save thousands of lives, otherwise murdered through ignorance. The medical work opens up the country to the Gospel and reaches many homes that would otherwise be closed.

Dr. W. H. Forsythe writes: "Sorcerers and sorceresses prey upon the superstition of the sick, professing to drive out the evil spirits that cause disease by the beating of drums, incantations and other heathen practices. The contrast between the methods of modern medicine and that of the Korean doctors and sorcerers, as well as the results attained, appeal quickly to the natives and they come in great numbers to the 'foreign doctors' for relief. And many who come to the 'foreign doctors' for the relief of bodily ills find the great Physician as the Saviour of their souls."

The Rev. W. R. Foote, of the Canadian Presbyterian Mission, writes:

"The great testimony to the genuineness of the colporteurs' work is the large number of people becoming Christians in each of the fields occupied by them. In each field a church has been built (in some fields

A SERMON

DREAMS

TEXT: Gen. 37: 19

"And they said one to another, Behold, this dreamer cometh"

THE brothers of Joseph are scarcely to be blamed for disliking him. To begin with, he was the favorite son, and his coat of many colors was a challenge to their envy. Further, it appears that he was a tattler: On returning from the fields, where his brothers were watching their flocks, he "brought an evil report concerning them." And he was somewhat of a braggart, too. He could not, perhaps, help dreaming; but he should have been discreet enough to keep his dreams to himself. Hear this: "I dreamed and, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field; and, lo, my sheaf rose and stood upright and your sheaves stood round about and bowed down unto my sheaf!" And this: "I have dreamed another dream, and behold, the sun and the moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to me!" Is it any wonder that his brothers envied him, or that they nicknamed him "The Dreamer," literally, "The Lord of Dreams"?

Do you believe in dreams? I do not mean dreams of the night, though time was when they were used as avenues of communication between God and men. "He speaketh once," says Job, "yea, twice, yet man perceiveth it not; in a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, and sealeth their instruction, that he may withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from him."

Ancient Dreamers

As yet there were no Scriptures to make known the divine will. The shepherds of the Orient lived the simple life; and, sleeping with the starry dome of heaven above them, their souls were open toward God. In these strenuous times we sleep less soundly; and our dreams are largely due to the excesses of the day. The spectres of Fret and Worry walk with us. "A dream," says Ecclesiastes, "cometh through much business" (Eccl. 5: 3). If there is any lesson to be drawn from such dreams it is hygienic rather than theological.

It was not so, however, when Jacob came to Bethel, a weary fugitive, and lay down to sleep with a stone for his pillow. "He dreamed; and behold, a ladder set up on the earth; and the top of it reached to heaven; and, behold, the angels of God ascending and descending upon it." The voice that spake to him in that dream was the very voice of God. We are not to infer, however, that every fugitive who now-a-days sleeps in the fields with his head on a stone, is to interpret his troubled dream as a message from God. We have a Book which is better than all the "dream-books" which were ever written; and it supersedes them all. The Bible is "a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path"; and we need no other. It is the complete and final revelation of the mind of God.

But I am thinking of day-dreams; such as Pope calls

> The air-built castle and the golden dream,
> The maid's romantic wish, the chemist's flame,
> The poet's vision of eternal fame.

We are living in a practical age. Its key-note has been struck by our President in his commendation of the strenuous life. "He who would win out," says a leading instructor, "must strip to the waist and enter the list of competition." We reckon all things in dollars and cents, in volts of power, in brain and sinew and convertible collateral; wherefore, "Be not a dreamer among the shadows, but a man among men."

Day Dreams

It is true that in a sunlit world there is little or no room for moon-struck people. No doubt a vast amount of time is wasted in vain imaginings, reveries, insane speculations, phantasms, abstractions and platonic hallucinations. There are day-dreams as empty as visions of the night. Such as Shakespeare represents Bottom's, whereof he said, "I have had a dream; 'tis past the wit of man to say what that dream was!"

But there are others that influence our lives immeasurably. There are day-dreams that crystallize into plans and purposes, systems of philosophy, institutions, governments and destinies. Out of our solitary hours of meditation they emerge and take visible shape. They form themselves into life and character and splendid achievement.

So David dreamed in the fields, in his closet, on the housetop, and in the Cave of Adullam, where he was brought face to face with the great verities; and his dreams came true. He says of them, "While I was musing, the fire burned" (Ps. 39: 3). The forces of his life were kindled, his holy ambitions were stimulated and his covenant was renewed with God.

*Preached in the Marble Collegiate Church, New York.

Are you dreaming? If so, of what, and to what end? Is it worth while? Let us see. One of the dreams that shapes itself to the serious purposes of life is the Ideal.

This is the dream of character. The dreamer speaks on this wise: "I will make the most of myself! I will be somebody!" This is a dream along practical lines. It is capable of clear interpretation, and one may, without misgiving, invoke the divine blessing upon it.

It is the glory of youth to intend and resolve "to get on." You may have recently seen in a periodical a photograph of a ship leaving the port of New York laden with immigrants returning to sunny Italy. One of them stands in the foreground with a bundle on his shoulder and a shovel under his arm. He is apparently satisfied with his shovel. He has been working as a day-laborer and is going back again to be a day-laborer in Italy. This man does not expect to "get on."

Dreams of Ambition

All honest toil is honorable. The man with the shovel may be among the best of men; but the mark of true manhood is the ambition to graduate from the position of "a hand" to that of a "padrone." Are you a clerk, or an apprentice? Be content with your lot; but beware of the contentment that rules out the purpose to better that lot as God may enable you. In India the iron barriers of caste forbid all progress: so that the scavengers and water-carriers of Bombay are of necessity the children of men who were scavengers and water-carriers in Bombay a thousand years ago. But in our country we scale such walls. The humblest boy at school may dream of becoming President. The ranks of promotion are free for all.

But what do you mean to be? Everything depends on that. Are you dreaming of wealth? So far so good: but remember the length of your tether. "Riches take wings and fly away." The millionaire who died yesterday went empty-handed into eternity; he "left all."

Or, do you dream of being a learned man? So far so good: "Knowledge is power," that is if you use it effectively. There is enough latent power in a tear, they say, to turn a mill; nevertheless tears turn no mills. And many a philosopher dies and leaves the world no better for his having lived in it.

Or do you dream of greatness? Is this your desire: to walk the streets and have people say "There goes thus and so"? Is it a title you crave: M.C., LL.D.? One of the most distinguished of our Congressmen said to me the other day, "I have passed my life among those who have achieved honor; and there's nothing in it." In the latter years of President Lincoln he was fond of quoting, with a pathetic cadence in his voice, these lines:

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour:
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

What then is worth while? What is the dream worth dreaming? It is the dream of Goodness: to be a good man or a good woman; there is nothing beyond that. Sir Walter Scott on his deathbed said to his son-in-law, "Be a good man, Lockhart. That is the sum and substance of all; be a good man."

And to this the dream of character leads on. One must have a clear conception of what he desires and means to be. This is the Ideal. But where shall we find it? Where is the exemplar by whom I may measure my character? "There is no difference, for all have sinned and come short." Paul and Apollos are but fallible men. The world has never seen but one man who was as good as the Law. Never but one who "brought the bottom of his life up to the top of his light." The magistrate who sentenced him to death passed judgment on him in these words, "Behold the man! I find in him no fault at all."

The Perfect Ideal

The life of Jesus by David Strauss, the German freethinker, contains these words: "If in Jesus the union of the self-consciousness with the consciousness of God has been real and expressed not only in words but actually revealed in all the conditions of his life, he represents within the religious sphere the highest point, beyond which posterity cannot go; yea, whom it cannot equal, inasmuch as every one who shall hereafter climb to the same height can only do so with the help of Jesus, who first attained it."

There, then, is your Ideal. Dream of being like him. Then follow up the dream with earnest endeavor and your dream will come true; as it is written, "I sha satisfied when I awake with thy likeness."

Another of the dreams worth dreaming is the Cast the Air. This is the dream of life. For life is structur the proverb runs, "A man is the architect of his fortune." An architect must see his castle in the before he builds it. He must frame his plans and line his specifications before he proceeds to give definite form. So Shakespeare says:

> When we mean to build,
> We first survey the plot, then draw the model;
> Then we see the figure of the house;
> Then must we rate the cost of the erection,
> Which if we find outwears ability,
> What do we then but draw anew the model,
> In fewer offices? Or at least desist
> To build at all.

The word "edify" has the substance of a sermo it. "Edification" is the scriptural term for ma character. It means literally "temple building"; this is the high purpose of life. "When we build," Ruskin, "let us think that we build forever. Let it be for the present delight nor for the present use a Let it be such work as our descendants will than for. And let us think, as we lay stone on stone, the time is coming when those stones will be held sa because our hands have touched them, and that will say as they look upon the labor and wrought stance of them, 'See, this our fathers did for us.'"

Castles in the Air

For whom do we propose to build this castle of life? For self alone? Shall it furnish quarters only me and have upon its door-plate the legend "N ber One"? Nay; that were to live a melancholy for "unless he can erect himself above himself, poor a thing is man!"

Shall we build for others, then? Surely. For man liveth unto himself." The new word "altru covers a truth as old as the Gospel. "When makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame blind, and thou shalt be blessed." Let the doo your life be open and the hand of welcome stret out to all who need it. To do good and to comm cate forget not. Live not for self alone, but for next man.

Is that all? Shall there be no room in your c for God? It is recorded that when Solyman cam the throne of Mysia in early youth, he sat among ruins of his capital and dreamed until he saw the shake off its shroud, saw people moving about its st and heard the hum of industry; then, rising from dream, he set forth to realize it. But a better v was that of the original Solomon, for whom this y was named, who went up to Gibeon and dreamed "house magnifical" which he should rear to the glor of God. And when that house was ready for its dec tion, he sat upon his ivory throne and the pe thronged about him, waiting—for what? Till should come whose glory was to fill it. "The Lord his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence be him!"

This, also, is a dream that comes true. He lives in pursuance of the truth that "the chief en man is to glorify God," finds his highest joy in thought that his life is so blended with the divine he can say, "I no longer live, but Christ liveth in m

And another of the dreams worth dreaming is Apocalyptic Dream of Heaven.

John's Vision

The tendency of our time is to frown on "ot worldliness." Confucius said, "You ask me if I be in the life beyond. My answer is, I do not know. T may be another life, but I am not concerned about i know that we are living here and now, and th devolves upon us to make this a better world as we through it." Such philosophy as this may be the est approach to truth possible for a Chinese sage, b unworthy of a man who has the light of divine lation. If we are going on to eternity, it devolves us to live accordingly and make due preparation fo

It is possible that there are those who are too m given to "other-worldliness," but I confess I have ne seen such a one. I have seen many absorbed in wo liness. Here is one who busies himself with a m rake in the accumulation of wealth, like a mag catching dollars in the air. Here is another who sp his life in the pursuit of pleasure; and here ano whose eyes are intent on a wreath of laurel that

THE GIFT FROM JAPAN'S EMPEROR

The Decoration of "The Rising Sun" a Recognition of Our Readers' Aid During the Great Famine

The Emperor of Japan

Her Majesty the Empress

"IN the name of my Imperial Sovereign, the Emperor of Japan, and of Her Imperial Majesty, the Empress, I am commissioned to convey to Dr. Louis Klopsch their royal acknowledgments for all the kindness and generous aid which you, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its editors and its readers, have extended to the people of our country during the late famine.

"Furthermore, as a token of His Imperial Japanese Majesty's regard, he has personally directed me to invest you with this decoration of the Order of the Rising Sun, a duty which I take pleasure in performing in obedience to His Majesty's command."

Thus spoke Baron Takewo Ozawa, through his secretary and interpreter, Mr. Masatake S. Togo, who had accompanied him to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, New York. There were present on this occasion, besides the two distinguished visitors, Dr. Klopsch and the editors and heads of the various departments of the paper. The date was May 15.

Dr. Klopsch, after receiving the decoration, responded briefly. He said, in substance, that the honor which had come so unexpectedly was one which he accepted in the name of the hundreds of thousands of contributors whose Christian generosity had made the relief work in Japan so successful. He desired Baron Ozawa to convey to their Majesties the Emperor and Empress his sincere acknowledgments. He referred to the universal sympathy which had prevailed in this country for the unfortunate Japanese peasants during the period of famine, and to the fact that then, as on various other occasions of a similar character, the generous-hearted American people had chosen this journal as the channel for their benevolence. Our nation, as a whole, entertained feelings of the warmest admiration and friendship for the people of Japan.

Baron Ozawa, again speaking through his interpreter, presented to Dr. Klopsch another token of regard for himself and the people he represented. This was the Japanese Red Cross decoration, and accompanying it was a certificate of life membership in the Japanese Red Cross Society. Suitable acknowledgment was again made by the recipient. Following the formal addresses, there was a pleasant interchange of courtesies, in which Baron Ozawa took part, speaking of the objects of his visit to America. He goes to London shortly, to attend the Eighth International Congress of the Red Cross Society as the representative of Japan. Since 1902 he has been the vice-president of the Japanese Red Cross. He is of the famous Samurai class, a member of the House of Peers, and was born at Kokura, in Southwestern Japan, in 1844. He has at different times occupied high offices in the army and in administrative capacities. He was promoted in 1879 to the post of Lieutenant-General, and was afterward President of the Royal Military Academy, Vice-Minister of the Army Department, and Vice-Chief of Staff. Since he became connected with the Red Cross work he has devoted himself to the study of philanthropic work and has done much toward bringing the society to its present perfect state of efficiency. His skill and the value of his services in this respect were demonstrated during the Boxer troubles of 1900 and again in the late Russo-Japanese war, when the Red Cross rendered splendid service in the field and hospitals.

Baron Ozawa was an honored guest of the Periodical Publishers' Association at their recent banquet in Albany, N. Y. On that occasion he addressed the assembled guests at the great banquet table, speaking through his interpreter. He said in part:

"I deem it the greatest honor to have been invited and to have been favored to speak a few words to you, who represent the opinions of the many, to you, who govern the whole world, because you can make peace or war. Our mission is, briefly, first to decorate Dr. Louis Klopsch with the Order of the Rising Sun, for his kindness and sympathies. Second, we come to investigate the real attitude toward Japan and to get the real feeling that exists in San Francisco, which has caused a sensation among our people. I am glad to say that I have not found a single person who is opposed to the Japanese coming to San Francisco, and I took occasion to cable the fact to my Emperor. It is absurd for any one to say we love war. We do not love it. In the war with Russia we were obliged to fight for the peace of the world. Japan looks for peace and nothing more. I hope an American-Japanese alliance will be brought about officially, although we have been allied for years. America is our mother, and she is a most devoted mother."

The Decoration of the Rising Sun

The Order of the Rising Sun, a photographic reproduction of which appears on this page, has an interesting origin. There are four orders of distinction in Japan, the two most important being the Order of the Rising Sun and the Order of the Chrysanthemum. The orders were all founded at about the same time, at the beginning of the reign of the present Emperor. The Rising Sun was first conferred in 1875. The decoration has engraved in Japanese characters on the back, the words "For Merit."

The order is given to Japanese or foreigners who have rendered great service to the Emperor and the empire. It is much coveted, and among the distinguished Japanese who have received it are Marshal Oyama, General Kuroki, who is now on a visit to the United States, Baron Shimpei Goto, who is adviser to the Japanese administration in Manchuria, Baron Ozawa and other generals, admirals, and high officials.

The order holds the same place in Japan that the various orders of knighthood hold in European countries. The badge is made to represent the rising sun of Japan. There is a central disk of crimson, and from this radiate the golden rays of the sun. The spaces between are in white enamel. The decoration is suspended from a white ribbon, edged with crimson. It is worn on the left breast on occasions of ceremony. At other times, a little button of crimson silk is worn in the buttonhole of the left lapel of the coat, and serves as a "recognition button."

Baron Ozawa did a good deal of sight-seeing and traveling during his stay here. He visited a number of our leading cities and spent several days in Washington, where he met President Roosevelt and was entertained at dinner by Secretary Taft. He visited the Capitol and the various departments, and displayed much interest. In New York he was specially interested in the tall buildings. He visited the City Hall and the Stock Exchange. He was also deeply interested in the hospitals and the varied charities of the busy metropolis, visiting several of the former and making a painstaking investigation of the latter, in order to familiarize himself with our methods of meeting the great problems with which they deal. On the last day of his stay, the Baron and his party were the guests of Dr. Klopsch in an automobile ride through Central Park. He sailed for London on May 25.

nd crumbles as he grasps it. Yet everybody knows iat these things are not worth while; because "the loud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces, the solemn emples, the great globe itself, yea, all which it inherit, hall dissolve, and like this unsubstantial pageant faded, ave not a rack behind."

What then? Then eternity! If so, is it not wise o think upon it, to adjust our lives to it, to dream of it?

> O that home of the soul! In my visions and dreams,
> Its bright jasper walls I can see:
> Till I fancy but thinly the veil intervenes
> Between that fair city and me.

So Abram dreamed of "a better country, even a eavenly; and a city that hath foundations, whose uilder and maker is God." And his dream came true.

So John dreamed in Patmos: "I saw that holy city, ew Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. The twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl. And the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass." And as he dreamed he heard a voice, saying, "Behold, I come quickly!" And as he answered, "Amen; even so, come, Lord Jesus!" his dream came true.

It is a proverb, "Dreams go by contraries." So be it for dreams of the night, but not for the day-dreams that spend themselves on truth and righteousness.

The dreams of Joseph followed him. In due time a train of wagons came rumbling down from Canaan; and old Jacob and his sons presented themselves at the Egyptian court. Then all the sheaves bowed down before Joseph's sheaf; and the sun and moon and the eleven stars did obeisance unto him. He had kept himself in hand, meanwhile, as a purposeful man. He had refused to turn to right or left from the pathway of duty as God gave him to see it. And the multitudes ran before his chariot, crying, "Zaphnath-paaneah," "The Bread of Heaven." So did his dreams come true.

Dream on, then, of life and destiny. Dream as the prophets did, who were wont to say, "I dreamed, and, lo, the Lord stood by me." Let God walk through your visions and enter into fellowship with all your plans and purposes. "Enter into thy closet and shut the door, and pray;" and out of thy prayers let dreams emerge to find their fulfilment in character and usefulness. Dream on, until the day break and the shadows flee; until faith is lost in sight and hope in fruition. And in that day it shall be said, "Ah, this is more wonderful than we ever dreamed it would be." For "eye hath not seen the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

THE COMING PEACE CONFERENCE

Representatives of Many Governments to Meet at the Hague this Month

WHEN the second International Peace Conference assembles at the Hague, Holland, June 15, it will undoubtedly be a representative body in the highest sense. Germany, Russia, France, Austria, Great Britain and Italy have each sent as delegates men of the most exalted abilities. Spain, Portugal, Greece, and practically all of Europe will be well represented. The Far East will have in the Conference shrewd and experienced Oriental statesmen from Japan and China. Central and South America will participate for the first time in these deliberations.

Our own government and people will have in the Conference a delegation which includes Hon. Joseph H. Choate, of New York; Gen. Horace Porter, of New York; Hon. U. M. Rose, of Arkansas; Dr. David Jayne Hill, of New York; Brig.-Gen. George B. Davis, U. S. A.; Rear-Admiral Charles S. Sperry, U. S. N.; Hon. William I. Buchanan, of Iowa; Hon. Chandler Hale, of Maine, secretary to the delegation; Prof. James Brown Scott, of California, expert in international law, and Mr. Charles Henry Butler, of the District of Columbia, expert attache. These are all men of ripe experience, with a knowledge of international law, and a familiarity with the leading subjects that are liable to come up for discussion in the Conference.

Although, as in the first Hague Conference, Russia has again taken the initiative in summoning the representatives to meet, the outlined programme which the Czar's secretaries submitted will probably have to be greatly modified. In a certain sense, the Peace Conference will have its hands tied even before it begins its work. It is true, it will be free to discuss certain matters, including the broadening of the scope of the Conference by extending to non-signatory nations the invitation to become signatories and the extension of the arbitration principle by the introduction of a general treaty embracing practically all the Powers represented in the Conference. But the two vital questions of the limitation or reduction of naval and military armaments, and the proposition (known as the Drago doctrine) that no nation shall resort to war for the collection of a debt from another Power, will, in all likelihood, either be shelved or left untouched.

The Ridderzaal at the Hague
In which the Peace Conference meets next week

That the question of disarmament is one from which all the Powers seem to shrink instinctively has been made clear during the last three months. One after another the European Powers have definitely intimated their unwillingness to have this question discussed at the Hague. Russia, while including this topic in the programme, seems to have entertained no expectation that it would pass muster with the other Powers. Germany openly declared that to attempt its discussion would be futile and a waste of time. Austria echoed the judgment of Germany, and France and Italy were understood to agree. Great Britain for a brief while held out for the discussion of disarmament, but lately, to gratify the other Powers, agreed to its presentation in a form so modified that the disarmament proposition is practically killed. The United States alone stands as the avowed advocate of a gradual limitation of armaments.

Regarding the Drago doctrine, Russia seems to have decided at least to make an effort to bring it up for discussion. She has retained two experts, Major-General Yermoloff and Colonel Michelsson, who have written a treatise on the doctrine which will be widely circulated at the Hague.

But, after all, at no recent time has there been a general expectation that the Peace Conference would attempt to make disarmament an acute question just now. However visionaries may talk and write on the subject, it is well to remember that great reforms usually progress slowly, and that the cause of the world's peace is not to be advanced by projects for which the times are not yet ripe. In all probability, our American delegates hold the conservative view and will act with wisdom accordingly, as opportunities arise.

If the Conference accomplishes only two or three things of the many which will come up before it, it will have done well. These desirable results we consider to be: 1, a general arbitration treaty embracing all the Hague signatories; 2, making the Hague Conference permanent and open to all nations; 3, the immunity of private property at sea, not contraband, during war-time. If these three objects were attained and the special status of the Conference fixed by the recognition of the combined governments generally, it would be a tremendous step in the direction of world-peace.

SUMMER DAYS AT NORTHFIELD

AT Northfield this summer visitors will have an opportunity of hearing some of the great men of the Christian world, speakers selected with reference to two ideas: their ability to arouse religious fervor and to train Christians in methods of work that are practical, businesslike and winning.

Rev. Dr. F. B. Meyer, of London, the fervent preacher of the spiritual life and clear-headed social reformer, who has not been at the conferences for four years, will be at Northfield during July, to lecture daily on "Bible Characters." Other speakers will be Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, one of the leading speakers of the World's Sunday School Conference at Rome; Rev. J. Stuart Holden, who has stirred up London by his practical sermons, and is leading a most successful Bible class for the training of would-be Christian workers; Bishop Lawrence of the Episcopal diocese of Massachusetts, who will appear before the Students' Conference, showing that the dignity and beauty of the Episcopal forms feel the need of Northfield enthusiasm; Robert E. Speer and John R. Mott, whose earnest speeches have heartened many successive gatherings of college students; Charles M. Alexander, whose service of praise two years ago was a prominent feature of the Northfield gatherings; Rev. W. R. Lane, of London; Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, of Philadelphia; Prof. James Orr, of Scotland, and many other notable men and women.

To one who is tired of the typical society summer resort and small piazza gossip, Northfield appeals very strongly. It is cheaper, for one thing. If you have a mind for the "simple life" and "the call of the wild," you can have a cottage in the pine woods on the mountain slope, near the conference auditorium. The first of these cottages were put up for a few hundred dollars each. Built of slabs with the bark left on, with fans and curtains, and with draperies in picturesque dashes of color, they appeal to the artistic feeling. One clergyman has had his woven wire mattresses slung between pine limbs. Comfort and the primitive are thus brought together in a fascinating way. They say that many of these cottagers live for $3 each a week.

Returning From Service at the Chapel, Northfield

Of course, you will go to the meetings, though you need not rush after an early breakfast and pre-empt seats under the speaker's nose at 7.30, to wait until the first lecture begins at 9, as many Northfield devotees do. The number of meetings and the size of the auditorium make this unnecessary.

The dates are as follows: Student Conference, June 28 to July 7; Young Women's Conference, July 9-1 Summer School of Sunday School Workers, July 27; Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies, July 30; F. B. Meyer Daily Bible Class, July 1-30; General Conference of Christian Workers, August 2-18; Pastors' Conference Addresses and Special Bible Lectures at the Northfield Schools, August 20 to November 1. During August, the Discussion of "Pastoral Evangelism," which proved of so much interest last year, will be renewed, and it is expected that some time will be devoted to a conference on "Organized Men's Bible Classes." Athletic and social life, the beauties of the lovely hill country, and the winding Connecticut river give every opportunity for a normal Christian summer.

IMMIGRANTS AND THE BIBLE

Scenes and Incidents in the Bible Society's Work Among New York's Foreign Population

WITH wild, frightened, wondering eyes, they greet their new home. A vessel has just landed and everything looks strange. At every hand they can see the strange cabalistic characters on the signs. They are immigrants landing at Ellis Island. Now they are ordered into a compartment from whence they can only depart in single file; here they meet the doctor inspectors; one doctor looks at the eye, and lifts the eyelid; another feels the skin. No wonder these human creatures look frightened! "What is going to be done to us?" they think in their own language.

Dr. Geo. W. Carter

Now they pass the desks where they must even show their money. How carefully they show it! It is the result of long days and perhaps weary nights of toil. "Will they take it from us?" they wonder. Here is a little broken-hearted group, where stands an old grandmother crying bitterly, holding by the hand a young child, while several are grouped around her. The mother has been "detained." She had been suffering from sore eyes, and the doctor finds she has an incurable eye trouble. Now the father comes. He is in distress, too, but Uncle Sam, ably assisted by Commissioner Watchorn, is very careful: he must protect his own children, and cannot adopt any new ones to do them harm. The poor family, too, has no visible means of support and no friends; they may have to return again to the old drudgery in the Russian peasant district.

Here comes a disconsolate-looking man with a companion. He has come from a thrifty family in Denmark, and on his way over has fallen in with a young man from Poland. The Dane can speak Polish fluently, as his mother came from Poland and has taught him the language of her childhood. These young men are both strong and healthy; they are sent out by their families as scouts; they have plenty of money for their needs given to them by their expectant, waiting loved ones. They started out in high hope, but everything is so strange they feel a little homesick and blue.

Just now a man with a sweet smile steps up and hands the Dane a small book. The young man thinks to himself, "I cannot read it." But just as the thought is born, a look of glad surprise breaks over his rugged face; it is in his own language; it is a fairy dream—such joy! His home tongue and—it is the Gospel of John, handed to him by an agent of the New York Bible Society. How disappointed the poor Polish lad looks. For he is not like his friend; he can only speak one language; all his family were Polish. The agent sees his look of disappointment as he looks at the book, and, shaking his head, says, "Polish, Polish"; but now his face breaks out in a radiant smile, as the agent hands him a Polish Gospel. This work is going on constantly, carried on by two godly men, Mr. Ernest Jackson and Mr. Michael Lodsin. Mr. William G. Jones does something of the same work visiting the shipping and craft that enter the port of New York.

These sailors are won sometimes for Christ, when they could be reached in no other way, and they are reached in their own language.

Among the immigrants who crowd in upon our shores at Ellis Island, there was a Swedish woman who one day recently wished to purchase a Swedish Bible from Mr. Jackson, the agent of the New York Bible Society. She selected one, the price of which was one dollar and ten cents. She handed Mr. Jackson a two dollar bill, and refused to accept any change. Upon his questioning her, she told him that more than twenty years ago, when she first came to this country with two little girls, he had given her a copy of the New Testament. She said that her girls were now living in the West, happily married, and having families of their own. She had been on a visit to Sweden, and was now returning to this country. She wished him to accept the balance of the two dollars as a token of gratitude for the New Testament he had given to her more than twenty years ago, when she landed, a stranger, upon our shores.

George William Carter, Ph.D., has recently been elected general secretary of the New York Bible Society. Dr. Carter has had a wide experience. He was born in Rosario, Argentina, S. A., while his father, Dr. Thomas Carter, was a missionary in that place. He graduated from Wesleyan University and Drew Theological Seminary, receiving a fellowship from Drew, under which he went to Oxford, England. On his return he took up graduate work at Yale, receiving the degree of M.A., and then he decided that he would go as high as he could, and went to New York University, where he received his degree of Ph.D.

The New York Bible Society was organized December 4, 1809, and is the only society whose sole work is the distribution of the Bible in New York City. The office is at 66 Bible House. Dr. Carter has supervision of the entire work of the Society. The work on Ellis Island and the shipping of the port as well are looked out for by the faithful workers there, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Lodsin, and Mr. Jones, who are always found at their posts. Dr. Carter speaks in different churches of all denominations, and he says he "has the unique position of not asking for a collection." The Society is supported mainly by gifts. The American Bible Society gives the New York Society a sum of $3,750 each year, and takes the collections in the churches. This is in pursuance of an arrangement between the two societies.

The total distribution by the New York Bible Society during the past year was 93,585 volumes of Scripture in thirty-four languages. The work is entirely unsectarian. Sixty men, members of leading New York churches of various denominations, compose the Board of Managers.

The Society is of great help to city pastors and missionaries, as grants of Bibles may be obtained at the office for house-to-house visitation. A great silent work is constantly going on in our great city in this way, and in the foreign population each can have a Bible in his own language.

Hotels and prisons, hospitals and charitable institutions also come under the care of the Society, and many in these places are constantly lifted to a higher life.

Dr. Carter says: "New York is the greatest city in America, and the New York Bible Society stands alone in its work there; because of this fact the Society should be considered among the most prominent factors in Christian and city missionary work, as the Bible is the foundation of all Christian progress."

Bishop Taylor's Birthday

May 2 is observed every year at Taylor University, Upland, Ind., in commemoration of the birth of its promoter, Bishop William Taylor, the Apostle of Africa. Prize essays are read on the life and work of Bishop Taylor. The contest is open to all the students of the University, and three prizes in money are offered for the three best essays. The successful contestants this year were Ellery Charles Pengra, of Michigan; Frank Lynn Breen, of Illinois, and Bessie Sybilla Eckman, of Pennsylvania. After other addresses, at two o'clock a "Bishop Taylor love feast" was held in the chapel. The meeting was marked by the recital of many interesting personal reminiscences of the great Bishop.

The "Personal Substitute" Roll of Honor

AS the most practical illustration we can furnish of the cordiality with which our "Missionary Substitute Plan" is being received, we append the names of twenty patrons, chosen at random from our Roll of Honor:

Mrs. Arthur J. Barnes.	Mr. Nathan Thompson.
Mrs. M. A. Squires.	Mr. W. A. Prugh.
Miss Ida Armstrong.	Mr. H. Harris.
Miss Charlotte Runeberg.	Mr. G. L. Cook.
Mrs. C. H. Manning.	Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Dodson.
Mrs. Minnie M. Meiner.	Danville Bible Class.
Mrs. J. H. Wilson.	Mr. Dessalone Sorrels.
Miss Fannie L. Lake.	Mr. Alfred H. Manchester.
Miss N. M. Carver.	Mr. Francis I. Sweet.
Mrs. W. H. Simmons.	Mr. Robert N. Farrington.

These twenty Christian men and women stand in front of the steadily swelling list of those who desire to have an individual part in winning for Christ souls that are now in darkness. Keenly alive to the advantages of the "personal representative" idea, patrons are responding from the far West, the South and even the remote North, as well as from our own immediate vicinity. All are zealous to aid in this enterprise for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom.

We hope soon to extend the "Roll of Honor" of patrons who have personal substitutes at the front, to large proportions. It is a long distance to many of the remote missionary stations, but our friends in the field are now responding numerously. We confidently expect soon to have established direct communication in every case between patron and substitute.

The Coming Peace Conference

TEN days from this date, the representatives of nearly forty governments—European, American and Asiatic—meet at the Hague, to confer on matters that relate to the world's peace and happiness. At the approaching Conference, some of the countries present will be participants for the first time in such a gathering.

Only a few years ago, the "crowned heads, cabinets and mighty men of war" affected to pooh-pooh the Peace Conference. They pointed out the indisputable fact that such a gathering, having no official standing or recognition, was powerless to carry out its plans for the world's peace—in a word, that it was a court by courtesy, but lacking the power to enforce its decrees. But time has wrought a wonderful change in the attitude of rulers and governments toward the Peace Congress. They see the races on every hand becoming enlightened. They realize that with growing intelligence men begin to comprehend the truth that war is the greatest of all human crimes and follies; that violence settles nothing, but leaves a quarrel infinitely worse than before, and that there is no dispute that can possibly arise between the nations that is incapable of being settled by arbitration.

But while enlightened people generally must necessarily take this view, we need not expect that potentates who rule chiefly by virtue of a military system will adopt it. Hence we are not surprised to find that the leading governments, almost without exception, are opposed to the discussion at the Hague Conference of any plan looking to a reduction of armaments. They will send their representatives there to talk of peace; but they will still go on building great guns for inflicting wholesale slaughter, rapid firers for mowing men down like grain, and various horrific devices for the destruction of human life by sea and land.

We are willing to believe, however, that in spite of their warlike panoply, some of the Powers to be represented at the Hague sincerely desire peace. Japan's ruler, still wearing the fresh laurels from a victorious campaign, has given to the Congress, through his plenipotentiaries, the reassuring message that "the maintenance of the peace of the world is our great concern." An effort has been made by certain European Powers to sow seeds of discord between the United States and Japan, but the sinister purpose is so obvious that the whole scheme is discredited. The truth is that Japan, far from being consumed with a passion for conquest after two successful foreign wars, finds peace most desirable for the nation's welfare, and will do what she can honorably and legitimately to secure it.

If we may accept the assurances of the other Powers—France, Germany, Russia, and Great Britain—they, too, desire peace, but the concord of the quartet ceases when the question of gradual reduction of armament arises. They desire peace, but with reservations.

We ourselves claim to be a peace-loving nation. Only a few weeks ago we so declared to the whole world. But even Mr. Carnegie's peace-fest recognized the wisdom of preparation for future emergencies. It is a sad commentary on our modern civilization that the Power which is most potential for peace is that Power which is most formidable for war. Hence, our increasing naval and military strength, our submarines and war balloons, which, while they increase the burdens of the community and the individual, also give increased assurance of national security. Besides, we are told that, as conservators of the peace of a continent, we must be prepared to enforce order among the small militant republics south of us, whose quarrels, if uncontrolled, might jeopardize too much. If Uncle Sam is to be care-taker of this half of the globe, he must accept the responsibility.

On the whole, therefore, we must not expect too much of the Hague meeting. If it should succeed in securing the assent of its signatories to a general arbitration treaty, and in establishing itself as a permanent advisory Congress, it will have taken a great step forward in the right direction.

The East Bringing Gifts

IF proof were needed by those who doubt that Christian sympathy is universal, and that a kind deed done in Jesus' name repeats itself around the world, it is found in the remarkable letters on the China relief work which appear on another page.

Intelligence of China's famine has penetrated to the remotest lands. When ancient Syria, the land where Christ was born, heard the story, the Christians of that country sent a royal gift in his name. Egypt, where he once dwelt as an infant, heard the call, and the believers there opened their treasuries and poured out liberal offerings for the relief of the sufferers.

These races, living many thousands of miles apart, were moved by the common impulse of Christian love and charity. As in that far-off time in Bethlehem the travelers from the East brought their offerings and laid them at the infant Saviour's feet, so now the East sends its tribute of love and sympathy in his name who said, "I was an hungered and ye gave me meat. . . . Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

A Worthy Example

GENERAL FREDERICK FUNSTON has several times shown his fitness for the trust that has been placed in him by the government since he came into public notice during our late unpleasantness with Spain. He did much toward bringing order out of chaos in the Philippines, and stopping the carnival of blood that the natives had been carrying on for centuries. The way in which he appeared on the scene after the first shock of the earthquake, and with his troops stopped the looting and protected both property and people is still fresh in the public mind. His reputation for good judgment was at this time greatly enhanced.

A few days ago it was General Funston's turn to be promoted to still higher rank. The officer who came next to General Funston on the army list was his senior in years though his junior in rank. General Funston admired him as a man and as a soldier. Funston is a young man and felt he could wait for further honors himself, while his brother officer, being advanced in years, serving in the Civil War, would probably not have the opportunity to reach the higher grade. Funston wrote to the War Department at Washington, and asked them to promote the officer instead of himself. It was a most graceful and honorable act, and it comes just at a time when such an example is needed.

It has become the fad to demand "young blood" in everything. The old adage "old men for council, young men for war" is as good to-day as it ever was, but the unthinking are now making it "the young man for every place and every time." They let the man still useful, and of riper judgment on account of his long experience, be put to one side, and the world is the loser thereby. The world would be the gainer if there were more men of Funston's type, who would see to it that so far as they are concerned, there would be credit given where it is due, especially where long and faithful service has made it the more deserved. Let the "rushers" and the "hustlers" stop a moment in their career and see if they are interfering with the rights of others who are going the same way. The young can afford to wait when the way is narrow and some one of older years is going the same road.

A Warning From France

SERIOUS disclosures have been made by an investigation which has been conducted in France. The indicate that in at least one French province alcoholis is sapping the strength and life of the people, and undermining the national vigor. The importance of th discovery to the American patriot consists in the fa that the latest statistics show that the consumption intoxicating liquor among ourselves is increasing. W are now drinking not only a larger quantity as a nati —the increase of population would account for that- but the average consumption of the people individual is increasing. The quantity consumed per capita, th is, the total quantity divided by the population, is large That fact makes the experience of our sister republ across the Atlantic a lesson we cannot afford to ignor

Dr. Brunon of Rouen has been making an examinatio of conditions in Normandy, and reports that the distri is being desolated by alcoholism like a terrible scourg He says:

> Alcoholic drinks are frequently given there even to sucklin babes. When children are ill, alcohol is the first remedy give even in cases of convulsions. Women have particularly take more and more to alcohol, and this accounts for the increase alcoholism among children.
> At the present time it is the mode for the youth to take absinth and in this is involved the greatest danger. Many young me sometimes three-fourths of the whole number drawn, appear examinations for the army more or less drunk, while fifteen twenty mayors with flushed faces assist at the examination.

The result is extensive physical deterioration. Th young men are unable to bear the tests required in th army, which is an indication of their incapacity to d useful work in the trades and professions. They ar feeble mentally as well as physically, and their dull, soc den faces show that they have fallen very low in th scale of humanity. That the women have fallen, too is a most serious aspect of the case, because it destroy the hope that the next generation may improve. N wonder that French patriots are concerned at the report Other nations should be warned in time.

Among the Workers

—THE NEW ENGLAND "Watch and Ward" Society of Boston Mass., is winning golden opinions from the citizens of uprightnes and integrity throughout the commonwealth of Massachusetts b the aggressive campaign it has instituted against bucket-sho gambling and the swindlers who congregate in its wake. Th passage of the Anti-Bucket-Shop Bill in both houses of the legisla ture will constitute a notable victory for Massachusetts in th annals of clean legislation.

—SUPERINTENDENT MAURICE RUBEN, of the New Covenant Mis sion, Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "God's blessing has been restin upon our work. Quite a number of conversions have taken plac among our brethren during the past season. Recently the Boar of Directors purchased a property on the corner of Reed an Crawford Streets, Pittsburg. It is a three-story modern fla building, and on the vacant lot adjoining it is purposed to erec another building for the full equipment of the mission. Severa departments are to be developed."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Pedestal of Conquest

VERY impressive is the allegory contained in the famous picture now on view in the Paris Salon. The artist, Mr. William Laparra, has given a vivid ...ssion of the sorrows and miseries that lie beneath ...destal on which the warrior is crowned. At the ...re the widows and the orphans standing on the edge ... newly opened grave in which the husband and ... has been cast, their sombre garments and haggard ...s indicating their desolation. On the opposite ...nity of the monument there is a general view of ... life, the bride waiting for the bridegroom who has ... tryst with death; other women with the babes in ... arms who have been made fatherless by war, and in ...ar young girls who, instead of being happy sisters ...ives, will drift with the flotsam of the city's rapids. ... foreground is the wreck of a man whom death has ...d, but who must live a crippled and maimed exist... Above are the buttresses of the hideous temple, in ... are bodies of the slain laid in ghastly rows, tier on ...up to the capitals of the Corinthian pillars which ...rt the roof. In the front of the temple are the ...ng ruins of towns and villages, among which lie ... bodies being consumed in the awful holocaust. ...re all is the black horse of war on an abutment of the ...le, with the dome clad in its garment of smoke ...d him, and bestriding him is the warrior brandishing ...ripping sword. He has won fame, and if he would ... down he would see the horrors, and the bereave...s, and the desolation which have been the price of ... It is a picture of wonderful significance, about which ...ds gather, gazing rapt on its sorrowful details. Not ... in that gay capital who look upon the triumph of ...ainter's genius, know by sad experience how true it ... life. They still laud the hero and treasure the ...ories of his victories, but how many of them have ...red all their lives by the sacrifices they entailed. It ... strange coincidence that the famous picture should ... been placed on exhibition at this time, when the ...ference which is called to prevent war is about to ...t at the Hague. It teaches a lesson which the dele...s should have clearly in mind as they devise measures ...bolish the demon whose maw is never satisfied. How ... till the time come that the prophet foresaw:

...ey shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears ... pruninghooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, ...ther shall they learn war any more. (Isa. 2:4.)

...aying Buildings

...ews comes from Rome that the walls surrounding ... gardens of the Vatican are crumbling, and in one ...ce have actually fallen. The Pope has ...used to have repairs made on the ground ... the expense, which would be heavy, if ...y were made as extensively as appears ...essary. The Times calls attention to ... coincidence of similar repairs being ...ded to the Alhambra, and to the fall ...ne years ago of the Campanile in Venice. ... adds that there is "reason to fear that ... architectural marvels of the middle ...es are nearing the limit of their endur...ce, and that, unless they are subjected ... repairs and restorations, which not many ... them are likely to receive, the time will ...n come when people will have to do ...thout these visible reminders of the glories ... the past which forms so large a part of ...r history and literature. The old builders ...ew their business, but they were much like ...ir successors—not always too careful of their founda...ns, and not incapable of scamping their work even in ...e most magnificent structures, when it was to remain ...isible." It is with buildings as with character. The ...auty and stability of the superstructure fails if the ...ndation is not strong and well laid.

...he rain descended, and the floods came, and beat upon that ...se; and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock. (Matt. 7:25.)

...rtue in a Bishop's Touch

...An old superstition prevalent in Europe for five cen...ies had it that a victim of scrofula might be cured if ...ing laid his hand on the sufferer's head. On one oc...ion the royal hand was reluctantly placed there with ... wish, "God give thee better health and more sense." ...tory of a similar method of treatment, but of a more ...sonable kind, is now current in London. A certain ...hop who has just returned from Paris says that he ... proof of the efficacy of his own touch to cure a ten...ncy to drunkenness. It frequently fell to his lot when ...nistering in northern Paris to help home and put to ... somebody too drunk to walk. He invariably visited the drunkard the next day, and reasoned with him against the use of alcohol. One man promised to abandon drink if the Bishop would shake hands with him daily for a month before he started to work. The Bishop agreed, and went to his house every morning at half-past five, and shook hands with him. The man kept his word and reformed. The personal contact with a good man seems to have encouraged the frail creature to do that which he had failed to do in his own strength. Like the lame man whom Peter cured, the grasp of the hand consecrated to Christ gave power.

He took him by the right hand and raised him up, and immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength. (Acts 3: 7.)

A Stowaway in Trouble

A German steamer which arrived at New York last week from West Indian ports was the scene of some excitement during the voyage. The last place of call had been Port Antonio and thence the steamer sailed for New York. The captain was on the bridge and the passengers were lounging about the decks, when a loud shriek from below startled everyone. It seemed to come from the depths of the hold, in which twenty-seven thousand bunches of bananas were packed. The shriek was repeated and the captain was sending a sailor down to investigate, when a man leaped from the hold trembling with terror. He circled around as if in agony and pointed to the hatch through which he had burst. When he was quieted and the usual remedy administered, he explained that he was a sailor "gone broke." He was anxious to get to New York, but had no money to pay his passage; he had therefore sneaked on board and gone down into the hold to hide. There, as he was making himself cozy in the dark among the bananas, he felt a sharp pain in his hand and realized that a tarantula had bitten him. Some of the crew went down into the hold and there found the big spider, as the man had said, and secured it. Doubtless the sailor supposed that in the darkness of the hold he would be safe from detection and might make the voyage comfortably and without any cost to himself. This insectile attack spoiled his plan which must have appeared quite safe. So many people think who do evil secretly and think to hide from the retribution of God, but sooner or later, like this sailor, they are discovered.

Though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent and he shall bite them. (Amos 9: 3.)

A Lawyer's Humiliation

A member of a notorious legal firm in New York, that formerly had a large connection among the criminal and dissipated people of the city, was sent to prison on May 20. His conduct of a famous divorce case had involved charges of wrongdoing which the District Attorney pressed, with the avowed object of getting him behind the bars. He was successful and the lawyer was sentenced to pay a fine and go to prison for a year. He made a vigorous fight to escape imprisonment and it was expected that so able and shrewd a practitioner would succeed, but the last court of resort decided against him and he realized that, as he said, he "must take his medicine." His friends asked that his humiliation be no greater than was necessary. His automobile accordingly started from his palatial residence and carried him on his way to prison and the journey was finished in a carriage. His head was shaved, his mustache cut off, he was clad in prison garb and was locked in a cell eight feet by four. The next morning he was seen at his work by the other prisoners, many of whom had been clients of his firm in former times. There is widespread sympathy for him because of the striking change in his circumstances, though to a greater degree than most men he had incurred the malediction of the inspired writer:

Woe unto them that justify the wicked for a reward and take away the righteousness of the righteous from him. (Isa. 5:23, R. V.).

A Bewildered Girl

The officer in charge of the police station in City Hall, New York, had an unusual visitor one evening last week. It was a young lady, well-dressed, intelligent, and perfectly self-possessed. She said: "I've forgotten my name and I've forgotten where I live. I'm afraid to walk around the streets and I thought this was the best place to come to see if you can find out who I am." The officer questioned her without getting much light. She remembered that she lived in a boarding-house uptown, but she could not remember the address. "I've looked all through my pockets and purse, but I can't find anything that shows who I am," she said. The officer called an ambulance from Hudson Street Hospital and the surgeon who came with it failed to learn anything further from the girl. He said it was a case of aphasia and might continue a day or a week before the girl recovered her memory. The incident, with a description of her, appeared in a morning newspaper, and one of her friends, who had been concerned about her absence, read the account and went and claimed her. She knew her name as soon as it was uttered. The trouble in her case was purely physical; so much, however, cannot be said in excuse for some Christians who are sometimes seen in places and company in which no Christian should be. They, too, appear to have forgotten their identity and the name they bear.

Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness (II. Tim. 2: 19, R.V.)

Not Always Immune

A citizen of New York made a mistake about his being immune which had a fatal issue last week. About a year ago he was bitten by a rabid dog and was successfully treated at the Pasteur Institute. He imagined that after treatment he would be immune from all danger arising in future from such bites. He was therefore fearless in handling a rabid dog belonging to a friend who asked him for assistance in treating the animal a few days ago. The dog bit him and it is supposed that some of its saliva must have afterwards inoculated the wound. He was warned of the danger he was incurring, but he laughed at the risk and said that he was safe; he could do what others dare not do. He therefore disregarded the wounds he received, but in a short time he was seized with the recognized symptoms, and though he was taken to the hospital and well treated, his agonies increased, and after suffering torture he died miserably. A similar mistake is sometimes made by men who have been the victims of some habit they have overcome. They become less vigilant and despise their old enemy. The old temptation assails them in an unguarded moment and they fall.

Stand fast therefore and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. (Gal. 5: 1.)

THE WHOLE WORLD HELPED CHINA

Contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund Came From Many Lands

NOW that the China Famine Fund is closed and the work in which a great army of good people in our own and other lands have been enthusiastically engaged is nearing an end, it is interesting to note the extremely wide range assumed by the relief movement. In this respect, it probably eclipsed all its predecessors. Gifts for China's suffering ones poured in from every State in the Union in a liberal stream, but they came also from "regions beyond" in no unstinted measure. Central America, the West Indies and Canada remembered China's starving millions. European lands sent their gifts direct through other scurces to the Relief Committees. To THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there came contributions from Asia and Africa, where its appeal for China had reached sympathetic hands.

Among the many thousands of letters, few could be found that strike a deeper chord of human feeling than those we publish below. The first is from far-off Syria:

SYRIA MISSION OF THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE U. S. A.,
BEIRUT, Syria, April 27, 1907.

LOUIS KLOPSCH, Esq., New York City:

Dear Sir: The story of China's starving millions has reached Syria. That their need is very great is realized not only by the missionary community in Syria, but also by many business men, as evidenced by their liberal contributions in response to an appeal issued by this Committee.

We have only just begun to receive contributions; more are sure to follow; but as the need is a pressing one we have decided to send on the enclosed $292.27, in the hope that it will in some small measure aid in the great work of succor undertaken through the medium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Believe us, with all good wishes for success,

HENRY H. JESSUP,
WILLIAM H. HALL,
E. G. FREYER, Hon. Treas. } Committee.

From Dr. L. M. Henry, physician in charge of the American Mission Hospital, Assiut, Egypt, comes this even more suprising letter, which shows that human sympathy is world-wide and counts no distinctions, but regards all men as brothers:

It must give even the most unimaginative reader a thrill to think of these sons and daughters of Egypt—the land which was old even when Moses was born—coming forward in Jesus' name with their gifts of charity to the people of another ancient race, whom they never saw.

The Chinese in America have not forgotten their suffering brothers and sisters at home. In a letter from Mr. W. P. Lyon, business manager of the Morning Mercury and Evening Herald of San Jose, Calif., the writer says:

We take great pleasure in enclosing herewith a bank draft for $54, collection made in behalf of the Chinese sufferers. This fund was started by the San Jose Mercury and Herald and is being liberally subscribed to by all classes of people. It is the first instalment of what we hope will be a large subscription.

A second letter brought a further remittance of $122.18 from the same source.

Copies of the Mercury show that in a single day (April 25) the fund was almost doubled by contributions from Chinese residents of Los Angeles, whose hearts had been touched by the recital of their brothers' and sisters' woes at home. The local Chinese turned their gifts over to Mrs. Jessie Juliet Knox and Mrs. H. D. Mathews, two San Jose ladies whose influence had aroused their sympathies. Mrs. Mathews is the wife of the mayor and Mrs. Knox is a writer of recognized ability. In a letter to this journal, she gives this little story of the movement:

When the San Jose Mercury suggested that I get up an entertainment, I thought of this other way, and you will see by the enclosed clipping with what success it was attended. Altogether up to date I have raised $250.50, to say nothing of what the Mercury is doing. This makes me very happy, and I am sure will please you. You are doing the most wonderful work, and I wish to thank you in behalf of my dear Chinese people.

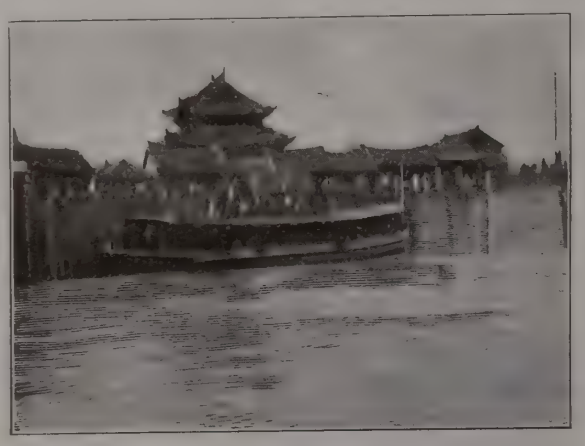
Mr. E. R. Johnstone, our representative on the relief ship, writes from Hawaii as follows:

HONOLULU, May 8, 1907.

The Buford reached Honolulu this morning. Just before we sailed from San Francisco I was accosted by a middle-aged and comely woman, who asked if she might present her husband, and upon my acquiescence brought forward a Chinaman of really venerable appearance and with the ceremonial politeness and ingratiating smile of the Oriental as old-time travelers pictured him. In broken but readily understandable English the Chinaman wished me a good voyage and a successful distribution of the flour.



A Relief Boat on the Canal

"I am a Christian," said he, "and I feel that the practical Christianity on board the Buford, showing as it does that 'the greatest of all is charity,' will make other Christians in the far-off land of my birth. How can it help it? My people are intelligent and appreciative. They must read and hear of what the Gospel is and means, and, hearing, must embrace. Such is my prayer, sir, and such my belief."

It is hard not to personify the steamer in which you voyage toward the horizon's rim and far-off lands beyond the watery wastes. You find yourself endowing your craft with feelings and sentiments such as inspire your own thought. It seemed as if the Buford must know that within her frame of steel rested the sustenance of many people; that her steam heart beat with earnest purpose of rescue and relief; that each throb of her screw meant the assuaging, in due time, of the hunger-throbs that have excited such generosity in the breasts of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Surely the heavens, the winds, the lapping waves have proved kindly to this venture thus far. The passage to Honolulu has been as quiesc as the most solicitous could ask, and the speed m has been better than the record of the ship heretofo

A very distinguished party boarded the steame scant two hours before sailing time, having been dela on the Union and Southern Pacific railways for fourteen hours. There are twenty-two Congressm with enough wives and daughters to swell the total fifty-two. They are the guests of the Hawaiian Le lature and will spend three weeks on the islands, study conditions and becoming acquainted with needs prospects so that they may vote intelligently u matters to come before Congress in the near future.

Of the party, too, is Mr. F. M. Hatch, of Washi ton and Honolulu, the leading lawyer of the islan He has been the counselor of Hawaiian kings, was last minister from the United States accredited to islands and, with Secretary of State John Sherman, framer of the Sherman-Hatch treaty that set the s and seal of American sovereignty upon the domain that great warrior, Kamehameha II. In a lect which he gave, upon request, to the assembled trav ers, Mr. Hatch told so much of interest that he held hearers' attention for two hours. Especially intere ing was it to hear this hard-headed man of affairs b testimony to what the missionaries had done for Sandwich Islands, of their altruism, intelligence, p bity, public spirit, self-sacrifice and potent influence good. In the very opening of his address he pu tured a wide-spread fallacy when he said, "There w no cannibals in the Sandwich Islands when Capt Cook landed; there had never been any; there ne were any cannibals in the Pacific north of the equat There were, however, human sacrifices, and the peo were priest-ridden, so that they were glad to hear doctrines of Christianity and eager to adopt them real and guiding beliefs."

Among the more noteworthy of the Congressmen Hepburn of Iowa (chairman of the Inter-State Comme Committee and author of the famous rate-bill), Alexan of New York, Littlefield of Maine, Keifer of Oh Conner of Iowa, Capron of Rhode Island, Stevens Minnesota, Bates of Pennsylvania, Lilley of Conne cut, and Brick of Indiana. Each is a seasoned legis tor, a man of influence, a seeker after national kno edge. The pessimist would find little to aid his b were he to listen to the discussions among these n and their colleagues upon matters of weight and c sequence affecting the body politic. The optim would take new inspiration were he to chat individua with most of the Congressmen. They recognize t problems that confront the nation and give every in cation of intent to approach their solution sober patriotically, conscientiously, intelligently.

Last Sunday morning a religious se ice of Bible reading and hymn-singing w held in the main dining saloon, and up a very general request the writer dressed the party and told its memb something of the needs in China, wh the good people of America, throu THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, had done ameliorate the suffering, the specific u to which the cargo was to be put, a generally, of what the paper and multitude of generous-hearted readers h done in other famines and along lines sympathetic endeavor within the deca and a half just past. As Congressm Capron put it:

"You see, we are part of the cargo the Buford and have a natural inter in—in fact, feel as if we were part of the splendid benevolence that prompt our fellow-Americans to reach out th hands of help beyond the seas to a star ing people."

I had a most sympathetic audience, a the story so familiar to CHRISTIAN HERA readers—the story of the multitude lives saved in Russia, Finland, Armeni Japan, India, Bulgaria, Cuba and t United States by the wholesale giving these self-same readers—was listened breathlessly and applauded vigorousl Almost every Congressman of note had specific inquiri to put, and each spoke hearty words of praise of T CHRISTIAN HERALD's work, coupled with satisfaction the gaining of wider knowledge of the doings and th intents of what one was pleased to term "the mo

He fails to esti- te at its true value the worth of a d woman's heart, nor does he reciate the fact that with economy may live on a small monthly end as comfortably as one.

Many years ago a young artist in lland, a man of brilliant genius later attained a splendid fame and reaped a golden vest, turned his eyes to America as the Mecca of his es. He was married, and he suggested to his young e that he should seek the new country by himself, ure a foothold and send for her. "No," she said, idedly; "no, dear, we will go together. happened one day to be chatting informally with a f-dozen young men in their early twenties, every one whom told me that he longed to be married and to e a home of his own. Each of these young men was lerk earning a very moderate wage. Two of them ttle later ventured to marry on a sum so small that encres shook their heads severely. As I write, I e heard from one of the two and I am happy in the wledge that everything has prospered with him, and t he now owns a little home on which there will soon not even a vestige of indebtedness. From the other ave not heard, but I do expect to hear good news e day.

The cost of living was probably never so high in the ge cities and their adjacent suburbs as it is in 1907. Still, the essentials of living are to be had at a price within reach of limited means, if only non-essentials are left out. Everything depends on the standard the young people have when they start the new home, and on the good management of the young wife. Let me add that a young husband might be surprised should he keep tally of his own little personal indulgences, such as newspapers that are bought to read on a train and thrown away at the end of a journey; carfares that could be spared if a man chose to walk a few blocks instead of to ride, and the quite needless luxury of tobacco and cigars. Smoking costs a good deal of money, and does an immense amount of harm. A young man should be able to discriminate between his love for his wife and his love of tobacco, and to let the latter go that the money it costs might help to pay the ordinary running expenses of a happy home.

What are these expenses? Broadly stated, they are for shelter, fuel, food and clothing. Doctors' bills and medicines are to be anticipated, and Christian people should not forget the debt they owe to charity and to sustaining the church. It might be interesting could we have a comparison of views on this important theme. I invite letters from young married people, from husbands and from wives alike, so that we may gather about a council board, and some may learn from the experience of others. Tell us how much or how little you had to spend in the first year of marriage, and how you have succeeded in your effort to maintain the home. What have you done on five hundred a year, or less? Names and addresses will be held strictly in confidence, if desired, and no clue will be given to the writer's identity. A prize consisting of a book that you will enjoy reading and adding to your home library, will be given in return for the best and most helpful letter received in four weeks from the date of this issue. Address correspondence to me personally, in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—A. P. It may sometimes happen that a hostess for personal reasons must change the date of the invitation. Nobody takes offense when this is done. A hostess sometimes recalls a general invitation, as when illness in a family makes it impossible to receive her friends as she had expected.

—A. You inquire what I think of a woman who will advertise for a husband. I think a woman stoops very low who condescends to anything of the sort, and a man who obtains a wife in such a manner need not be surprised if he has very little happiness.

When Love is Wrong Side Out

What a pity it is that love should ever be turned wrong side out! The right side is so smooth, so soft to the touch, so warm and comforting that one feels deep regret when the other surface, rough and seamy and full of hard knots and twists, shows itself, to the wounding of sensitive spirits, and the scorn of the world.

More than once lately, women have written letters to the editor of this page in which they have shown that they suffer because in their homes love is wrong side out. Sometimes the wife complains that her husband's mother, who is a resident in the home, is meddlesome, capricious and tyrannical. Again, a mother writes in bitter terms of her daughter-in-law, who has become an entering wedge of discontent and bickering in a household formerly harmonious. One feels a good deal of sympathy with a man who is in the position of son to one and husband to another, when the two cannot agree, and when their continual dissatisfaction is either smouldering or flaming. John cannot do much to help the situation. Both women love him and he loves them both, but unfortunately their love is wrong side out, and he is unable to reconcile their opposing dispositions. The only thing to be done when people have to live under the same roof and temperaments clash, is to make an honest effort to be fair and just, and in many cases to refrain from speech. Silence is less dangerous than speech when love is wrong side out.

What to Wear

Next to having nothing to wear, the most inconvenient thing possible is to be reduced to the wearing of one's best clothes. Old-fashioned gentlewomen had a way of keeping special raiment for special occasions, and whatever else they did, they refused to wear Sunday's clothing on Monday and Saturday. Modern fashions make less distinction between best and second-best gowns and bonnets, yet it is still the case that a woman provided only with a rich dress and a beautiful hat is ill-equipped for going to market, doing her housework and running out in the rain. Summer clothing implies more changes than winter, but equally in summer as in winter the costume for house and for business differs from that appropriate for church, for reception and for social functions in general.

The famous Miss Flora MacFlimsy of Madison Square deplored her lamentable lack of clothing, and though she had made three separate journeys to Paris she continued to bewail the fact that she had nothing to wear. The type is not extinct. There are young women with a brilliant variety of toilets who make the same complaint. But sensible women, young and old, know full well that nothing is more futile than to have too many articles of wearing apparel on hand at once.

Fashions change. For street wear and shopping a short skirt with jacket and shirtwaists meets every need. The most elaborate traveling dress requires only these three pieces.

For use in the kitchen or in the sick-room dresses that may go into the tub and emerge in pristine purity are preferred by refined and fastidious women. If well-chosen, such dresses should last more than a single season. A handsome dress kept in reserve for some special festive occasion usually affords great pleasure and satisfaction to its owner.

LED ON BY CLOUD AND FIRE

International Sunday School Lesson for June 16, 1907

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Route of the Forty Years' Wandering from Goshen to Jericho

AT last God's judgments upon Pharaoh brought him to the point of saying to Moses and Aaron, "Rise up, get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel; go and serve Jehovah, as ye have said . . . and bless me also." Strange sight! a Pharaoh asking an interest in the prayers of God's people. But alas! his repentance was short-lived. The Israelites were all in readiness to take advantage of the royal permission, having been warned of God to prepare for it, even to having their staffs in hand and their loins girt for the journey. What a going out was that! Two millions of people, and all their flocks.

The great God who had delivered them did indeed go before them to show them the way, and by his strong arm to defend them. We are told that God led them not by the way of the Philistines, which would have been by far the shortest way to the Promised Land, for fear the courage of the Israelites would not be sufficient to conquer such a mighty foe. But he led them southward by way of the Red Sea.

It did not take Pharaoh long to repent of the permission he had given the Israelites to depart. He led his great army forth in chariots to bring them back. The Israelites seemed to be caught in a trap, with the Red Sea in front of them, the mountains on their left, the desert on their right, and the swiftly pursuing host behind them. There was only one way the Israelites could look for escape, and that was up. Right grandly did Moses encourage them. He forgot about his excuse of a faltering tongue, neither did he need Aaron for a spokesman. Above the murmurings of the frightened people, in clarion notes rang out his command, "Forward!" He assured them that Jehovah would fight for them, and that they should never again see the Egyptians.

The Guiding Light

A wonderful sign God gave them: the pillar of fire to light their way in the night, which was a token that he was in their midst clothed in his shining brightness. As from the fire of the burning bush, God's voice was again heard by Moses telling him to lift his rod over the sea. Moses obeyed, and the waters were rolled back, and dry land was there for their crossing. What a grand triumphal procession was that! While the bright side of the guiding pillar gave light to Israel, the other side brought to Egypt such darkness as only God can make. The Egyptians stumbled in the darkness, and so were kept from overtaking the Israelites. And when they had passed over, and the Egyptians entered upon the dry path, God told Moses to stretch his rod again over the sea. Moses did so, and the waters rolled back and the Egyptians were drowned. In the morning their dead corpses were strewn along the seashore. What wonder that Moses and all the people sang: "The Lord hath triumphed gloriously!"

"God went before them in a pillar of cloud and fire" (Ex. 13: 21). How all ages have been enriched by that picture of God, wrapped in cloud and fire, leading on his people! He will therefore lead us, and by sorrows as well as joys. A boy walking under his father's waterproof in a wild storm at night felt no fear, only when the lightning flashed he tightened his grasp of his father's strong arm in which he trusted. Shall we have less confidence in the heavenly Father? Let us trust him where we cannot trace him.

God send his angels, Cloud and Fire,
To lead us o'er the desert sand!
God give our hearts their long desire,
His shadow in a weary land.
WHITTIER.

There is a spiritual suggestion, apropos of the pillar of fire, in the Finsen lamp, an electric lamp of high power which has been successfully used in curing certain skin diseases, especially lupus. Dr. Finsen, the inventor, a native of the Faroe Islands, under the midnight sun, being a delicate man, suffered much from the long nights and depressing darkness of his northern home. This led him to study light. "All that I have accomplished," he said, "in my experiments with light, and all that I have learned about its healing power, has come because I needed light so much myself. I longed for it so." And he came to this conclusion: that the light of the sun is undoubtedly "the most universal, the most economic, and the most active agent in sanitation, private or public." But sunlight is not always available, and the best substitute is electric light. Hence, Finsen's experiments and researches—one result of which was the now famous lamp for the treatment of diseases of the skin solely by light. This Dr. Finsen gave to the world in 1893. In July, 1899, her Majesty Queen Alexandra, then Princess of Wales, while on a visit to her father, the King of Denmark, inspected the Finsen Light Institute at Copenhagen, and on her return to England presented a large Finsen lamp, with four lights, to the London Hospital. We are healed by the divine light of revelation and the fire of affliction as well.

"Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" (Ex. 14: 11). There is encouragement in the fact that God led such a doubting, murmuring people and bore with their many faults.

A repulsive-looking old woman, who, after a life of unbelief, had been converted, becan[e] subject of persecution at the hands [o]godless neighbors. In every way [s]sought to anger or otherwise distur[b] spirit of patience and loving kindnes[s] now possessed her. Finally an old [p]secutor, having exhausted all her resourc[es] the attempt, venomously exclaimed, "I [k]you're the ugliest old woman that I ever s[aw]" To which the old woman, her face beaming [with] a light that made her beautiful, replied in t[he] "Wasn't it wonderful that He could have [loved] an ugly old woman like me?"

Fenelon writes, "Bear with yourself, b[ut] not flatter yourself. Work effectually [and] steadily at the correction of your faults, [but] calmly and without the impatience of [self-]love." Here are some profound sugges[tions] from Dr. James Mudge:

Rules of Patience

"I have had a great deal to do with [in]compatible people, and I soon found I sh[ould] be in condemnation all the time unless the I[ord] taught me the art of associating with them [har]moniously. And true to his promise to m[ake] a way in every temptation, he taught me [the] lesson—to settle down to the peculiaritie[s of] people as I would to the heaviness of lead, [and] to be no more provoked at the manifestatio[n of] these peculiarities than I would be at the m[ani]festation of the weight of lead. Also [he] showed me that this was the way to rece[ive] others as he had received me; for he kn[ew] my frame and remembered that I was dust.

"Since then, as soon as I find anything [dis]agreeable in the make-up of people, I accep[t it] as part of them, and do not expect anythi[ng] else, and commit it to the Lord, asking h[im] to make the trial and discipline it brings j[ust] the medicine I need at that time. In t[his] way incompatible people have become my ch[ief] means of grace, and many a time I have turn[ed] them into chariots—or rather the Lord has [used] which have carried me to triumph over s[in] that I could have reached in no other way."

In cyanide smelters you look at a lot [of] slimy stuff which seems to be worse than u[se]less, but your guide says, "Fourteen per cen[t] gold." So many a man seems so faulty as [to] be hardly worth saving, but to God he is fourte[en] or perhaps forty per cent. gold. Hardly less w[ill] the transformation wrought in Israel between th[eir] going down into Egypt and the coming back from t[he] captivity, which had proved to them a refiner's fire.

A Missionary's Welcome

The Rev. J. Noble Mackenzie thus describes his im[-]pressions on returning to the islan[d] of Santo in the New Hebrid[es] after a furlough in Great Britain: "We had a royal welcome on ou[r] arrival. The Christian chief an[d] some of his men put off in canoes [to] and were on board to greet us [as] soon as the ship anchored, whil[e] the rest of our people flocked t[o] the beach and stood there awaitin[g] our landing. On stepping ashor[e] we were surrounded by hundred[s] pressing on us to shake hands. We could not help contrasting i[t] with our advent eleven years before. Then, they were practi[-]cally all naked savages; now, they were all clothed Christians. Things at the station were in splendid order. We never expected that our property would have been cared for so well in our absence. Our flock of goats had increased, and our fowl-yard was overcrowded. The roads and grounds were in better order than when we left. Hedges were trimmed, fences renewed, and new outhouses built. The house had been left open without a door locked, and I had inadvertently left ten pounds in an open place, but everything was as safe as the bank. The services and daily school had been maintained by Philip, the teacher in charge. As a lad of twelve he came to us a heathen, and after instructing him for three years he became a Christian, and took a four years' course at the training institution for teachers."

"The Waters Returned and Covered the Chariots and the Horsemen and all the Host"

Marching Orders

"Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward" (Ex. 14: 15). Mountains or deserts hemming Israel in on their flanks; in the rear the thousand chariots of Egypt with their scythes to mow down men; and in front the sea. Yet God's marching orders were, "Forward!"

THE NEW Shoe FOR WOMEN
OFFICIALLY INDORSED

The Great Work of the W.C.T.U.

has never been endowed by a Rockefeller or a Carnegie as other worthy objects have been. And still it has gone on. The multiplied pennies of the poor, the hard, untiring efforts of a multitude of enthusiastic women have kept the battle-line unfaltering at the front.

A new method of helping on this splendid work has been devised by which the every-day needs of humanity are made to contribute to Humanity's Cause."

All civilized women wear shoes. In this country upwards of 100,000,000 pairs are made in a year.

A shoe manufacturer who believes the movement figured that if every pair of these shoes contributed 5c. to the W. C. T. U., it would mean $5,000,000 a year. He created the which offers this profit to the society. The shoe has only been before the public a short time, but it has already received the official endorsement of many prominent workers. A coupon goes with every pair—good for 5c. to the cause.

The shoes are the best that can be bought for the money. They are comfortable, sensible and good-looking, and the firm who make them stand for the principles of the society, not only as to Prohibition and Total Abstinence, but also in refusing to employ child labor. The W. C. T. U. can help on the work by asking your dealer for White Ribbon Shoes or writing the makers:

LITTLE KATIE'S VACATION

IT was one of those ideal mornings in late May, when every open square in up-town New York had put on its bravest attire in honor of the swiftly approaching queen of months; the grass-plots had donned their liveliest green, and the tulip beds were a blaze of color.

Alas, how quickly all the radiance of the fair morning was dimmed, as I hurried through the "lower east-side" street which led to the wretched home of Mont-Lawn's first applicant for the summer of 1907. One more turn into a narrow, dismal alley, and there, next to the rag-picker's loft, I found the number which meant home to little Katie. The atmosphere was twenty degrees hotter than that of Union Square only a short half hour before, and reeked with the odor of decaying garbage—six large cans of which were huddled about the entrance. Through the long entry-way, unlighted and unventilated, across the back-yard shut in on every side by the frowning sides of tall tenement-houses, I hastened to Katie's gruesome dwelling-place. A dozen ragged tots were playing listlessly upon the uneven flag-stones of the court. At the rear door a bowed and withered crone, who might have posed as Hopeless Age, eyed me curiously, as I asked: "Can you tell me where Mrs. Krauf lives?" "No spik Englis," was all the satisfaction I obtained; so, taking my courage in my hand, I plunged up four flights of worn stairs, encountering children, and yet again children—begrimed and wizened—upon every landing.

A few days before a nearby settlement worker had rescued seven-year-old Katie and her baby sister, half-clad and less than half-fed, from an awful daily martyrdom. It seemed that "Father," in the last stage of consumption, had been having a "bad spell" and had been hustled to the charity ward of a hospital; the mother, straining every tired nerve to keep a roof for shelter and win bread for the hungry mouths, toiled through the long, long day in a neighboring sweat-shop, "finishing" women's tailored coats for the munificent sum of thirty cents apiece. What should she do with the children? The problem was solved by turning the two boys into the street out of school hours, and safely (?) locking the two babies, one seven years, the other five months old, into the rear tenement on the fifth floor which they called home. From seven in the morning until six at night the two babies were alone, the poor "little mother" seeking her own crust in the bare cupboard and dextrously ministering to the peevish, ailing infant whose meagre body was all too heavy for the child-arms that bore it back and forth through the weary hours of the weary days. Can you picture it, reader? It is true—true as Gospel.

But all that is changed since the settlement worker found Katie, and now a very pale, wan little girl smiles rapturously as she listens to stories of Mont-Lawn's birds and flowers, summer skies and waving trees, and all the enchantments which cluster around our beautiful Children's Home. For Katie is going to Mont-Lawn with the very first load of wide-eyed, wondering "vacationers."

Candidates for a Vacation at Mont-Lawn

The friends of the children all over our land did yeoman service last year, and the children were grateful and appreciative. Many a feeble little life was won back to health, and given a "chance" by the generous patrons of Mont-Lawn, and yet we cry "more." Never has grim want looked quite so grim; never have the unchildlike faces of those Cherry Street babies looked quite so weird and pallid with the pallor of the tenements; never did the rags and dirt, the unsavory odors, and dismal, uncleanly passageways seem so closely to press upon all the wee Katies of Poverty Row, shutting out even the memory of God's fair, green earth, as on this one May morning of 1907. But "God's in his world," and his command rings through the centuries. "Let there be light" for the darkened lives of childhood—light for the dim eyes, light for the sleeping souls. We can give it, you and I. It is not only how much will you give for the "little mothers" of Cherry Street, but how much will you give up?

We want to endow every cot in the spacious dormitories of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn for the summer; we want $21 apiece to fill all the cots we have during every blissful night of the blissful summer, and then we want as much more to buy new cots. There are so many Katies!

Chief Chemist Wiley, of the United States Department of Agriculture, says: "There may be lockjaw germs in ice cream you buy." Everybody knows there's an element of danger in factory made creams and ices. As a matter of safety, therefore, prepare your own.

With an improved Lightning Freezer, you can prepare any frozen dessert quickly, economically, and with little physical effort.

The secrets of the Lightning's superiority are the patented Twin Scrapers and the famous Wheel Dasher. They alone insure continuous freezing. The scientific way they're geared helps for speed. The Lightning lends more actual assistance in the freezing of ice cream or an ice than any other freezer made. Other noteworthy features of the Lightning are drawn steel-bottom cans that can't leak or fall out, electric-welded round iron hoops that won't fall off, and durable pails that won't leak or come apart.

Insist on having the Lightning; every dealer can supply it

Write for a copy of "Frozen Sweets," by Mrs. S. T. Rorer. It gives the newer recipes for ice creams and other frozen desserts, also tells how to make two kinds of ice cream in one freezer at the same time.

The Whole World Helped China

widespread, effective, common-sense and businesslike benevolence I ever heard of."

By a rising vote, thanks for the very informal telling of truths were offered, and later a letter of appreciation for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its work, its editor and its readers was prepared, signed by every member of the Congressional delegation, and given me to forward to New York.

This letter is as follows:

"TRANSPORT 'BUFORD,'
"At Sea, May 5, '07.

"DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, New York City.

"Dear Sir:—A delegation of twenty-two United States Congressmen left San Francisco April 30, on board the U. S. Army transport Buford, en route to China with flour for the famine sufferers.

"To-day we were addressed by Mr. Edward R. Johnstone, who has the enterprise in charge. His subject was 'The Charitable Work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.' He spoke of many great works of charity in which you and your readers have been engaged. The story as told by Mr. Johnstone was intensely interesting. Your life and work are a great inspiration and worthy of highest praise. There is no nobler field in which to labor and none have wrought so well as you.

"We wish to congratulate you upon the success of your great enterprises in the past; we bespeak for you the grateful acknowledgment of your countrymen in the achievement of your high purposes and ask the blessing of heaven upon your future endeavors.

"Very truly yours,

"S. H. Piles, U. S. Senator from Washington; W. P. Hepburn, Iowa; A. B. Capron, Rhode Island; J. Warren Keifer, Ohio; C. E. Littlefield, Maine; J. P. Conner, Iowa; J. C. Neehdam, California; E. L. Hamilton, Michigan; Arthur L. Bates, Ernest F. Acheson, Pennsylvania; A. L. Brick, Indiana; D. S. Alexander, New York; E. Y. Webb, North Carolina; P. P. Campbell, Kansas; J. H. Davidson, Wisconsin; William W. Wilson, Chas. McGavin, Illinois; J. J. Fitzgerald, New York; Joseph V. Graff, Illinois; F. C. Stevens, Minnesota; G. W. Norris, Nebraska; George L. Lilley, Connecticut; Ralph D. Cole, Ohio."

Over summer seas and, after Monday, May 6, in semi-tropical heat, the Buford pushed steadily on, and Tuesday night the mountains that do encompass the Hawaiian Islands were sighted. Before seven on Wednesday morning (to-day) the army doctor had boarded us and given pratique, and the pilot had guided us past the reef and into the harbor. The reception to the Congressional party, whose coming has been eagerly anticipated, was enthusiastic and characteristic. It is an event in Hawaiian history and much benefit is hoped from it. There were hundreds on the wharves, one band of native singers, with flute and mandolin accompaniments, sang the soft songs of the islanders in tender welcoming, and following them a brass band—also native and excellent—played patriotic airs and those of Sousa's concept until the booming of the Congressional salute from the guns of the naval station put a quietus on milder sounds.

As soon as the gang-plank was down, numbers of pretty Hawaiian girls boarded the Buford, and quickly transferred their loads of garlands, carnation and laurel, to the necks of every one on board who would consent or bear the pretty and fragrant burden. Decked as for a triumph in Sicily of old the representatives were convoyed to their hotels and given opportunity to repair any wear and tear the eight days' voyage had entailed. Official functions followed and the programme for three weeks of festivities, journeyings, picnics, dinners and the like was made known.

At eleven to-morrow morning the Buford, having coaled to the limit of her bunkers, sets sail for Nagasaki, distant fifteen to sixteen days, and there again coal will be taken on board and a stop of from two to three days made before setting out on our last run to Shanghai.

E. R. JOHNSTONE.

From the editor of the North China Herald the following cablegram was received, giving the present status of relief work:

"SHANGHAI, May 18, 1907.

KLOPSCH, New York:

"Unlikely to be any fresh development. Foreign efforts concentrated upon continuing relief to present recipients. Farewell to Consul-General Rodgers was occasion of public acknowledgment by Chinese of America's great generosity. Special mention was made of generosity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers."

Called Higher

Mrs. Elizabeth Turner, of Schuyler Lake, N. Y., died January 9, 1907. She expressed herself at the last as prepared to go when her Master called.

Miss Sarah McMillan died in April, in East Marion, S. C., aged seventy-seven years. She was a devoted member of the Methodist Church, and leaves a solitary sister in their home.

On the 9th of February, Mrs. Daniel Webster, of Amesbury, Mass., passed from this world to her heavenly home. Mrs. Webster was an earnest Christian and a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Anna Von Deran, aged ninety years, died on August 7, 1906, at her home in Norristown, Pa. She retained her usual keen intelligence to the last, living and dying in the full assurance of the Christian's faith. Mrs. Von Deran belonged to the Reformed Church.

William S. Benton, of Cortland, Ohio, passed away on March 28, in his eighty-seventh year. Mr. Benton was a straight-forward Christian and an active member of the Congregationalist Church from early manhood. He has gone like a "shock of corn fully ripe for the harvest."

Charles A. Humber, of Goodrich, Ontario, Canada, died suddenly on March 15, in his sixty-eighth year. He was a man of the highest integrity and an earnest Christian. His loss is not only personal, a wife and six children being left to mourn his absence; but as a citizen his death is a distinct loss to the community.

Mrs. J. H. Carpenter died on March 19, at her home of more than half a century in Orange Township, Iowa, aged nearly ninety-two years. Four of her eight children survive their parents, to whom life is finer and nobler because of their mother's constant example of an ideal life of service and love.

Anna Kirkland, wife of Mr. A. V. Taylor, of Urbana, Iowa, passed away on January 9, aged fifty-five years. Five children remain with their father to sorrow for the absence of a good wife and mother, and a large number of friends testify to their esteem for the dead and sympathy for the living.

On April 10, in his fifty-second year, Charles Spiess, a native of Switzerland, died in Baltimore, Md. Mr. Spiess was upright in his business connections, faithful and generous in his church relations, kind and devoted in his family. His memory should live as that of a Christian man who literally obeyed the Scriptural tithing system. His last words were, "O Jesus, Saviour."

Mary Janet, wife of William R. Covell, died on February 10, in Perkins, O., in her eighty-sixth year. For nearly sixty-five years "Aunt Janet" had been a devout member of the Methodist Church, and to the last her daily life was a constant practice of the Golden Rule. A husband and six children live to miss the wife and mother who lived for their comfort.

Mrs. E. P. Foster entered into rest on February 22, from Adrian, Mo. A firm believer in the efficacy of prayer, for fourteen years she found THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a peculiar comfort to her, its written sermons and religious matter taking the place of the spoken word of which her deafness deprived her. Mrs. Foster was an earnest Christian and died with glorious faith and trust.

Mrs. Susan Jones Fisher, of Barton Landing, Vermont, a devoted Christian, has gone to her reward at the great age of ninety-seven years and six months. She consecrated herself to the Master at the age of sixteen, and it has ever been her joy to be a helper in doing his work. She was a member of the Congregational Church over eighty years, and was deeply in sympathy with all missionary work.

Mrs. Sarah Hill Morton, aged ninety-six years, and the oldest inhabitant of Liberty, N. Y., passed away on March 9, from the home of her grandson in Brooklyn. Mrs. Morton was a shining example of "the simple life," advocating temperance in all things and retaining a clear mind and unusual vigor during her advanced age; she leaves seven living children, thirty-six grandchildren and fifty-three great grandchildren. For sixty-one years she was a member of the Presbyterian Church.

HEALTHY SCHOOLMA'AM
Found Out How to Feed Herself

Many school teachers, at the end of their year's work, feel thoroughly exhausted and worn out, physically and mentally. The demand upon the nerves and brain of a teacher is unusual, and unless they are well fed and nourished upon a properly selected food, it is natural that they should run down.

A little woman teacher in Michigan, who has been teaching regularly for a number of years, has always found herself thoroughly exhausted at the end of the session, until within the past year, she has made use of Grape-Nuts and with the result that she closed the year in robust, healthy, strong, vigorous woman, having gained in weight from 90 pounds to 126; nerves strong, face bright and cheery, and is truly a wonder to all her friends, who constantly comment on her color and strength. She knows exactly to what the change is attributed, for in the years past, living on ordinary food, she has almost broken down before the school year closed, whereas since using Grape-Nuts, this change has been brought about; evidence prima facie of the value of Grape-Nuts food for rebuilding the brain and nerve centres. "There's a reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

How "Big Brothers" Save Boys

FOR over three years the West Side Branch of the New York City Y.M.C.A. has been carrying on a movement to help young boys who have been in trouble with the police and the courts, or who are likely to be by committing some small misdemeanor, or running away from school, unless some older hand is clapped on their shoulders with the comforting and encouraging remark: "Drop that and see if we cannot find something better for you to do!" The West Side Branch has a company of "big brothers," as they call themselves, and it is the duty of each big brother to look up some boy that needs companionship of the right sort. He watches over his play, his school or his work. The organization has been carrying out its self-imposed task with no advertising and no flourish of trumpets, but the idea is too good to remain hidden, and it is hoped that within a short time its methods will be in active operation in other cities.

From the Children's Court on Third Avenue, known to the young evil-doer as the "Kid's Court," there are sent every week to the Y. M. C. A. the names and addresses of boys who have been arrested during the week for some petty misdemeanor. Mr. Charles L. Powlison, the special secretary, goes over the list and then calls in some man who has signified his willingness to do something for some one besides himself. He is handed the name and address of a boy who lives nearest to the young man's home. The big brother is given what information has been secured about the boy, and then he goes to look up his younger brother whom he has never seen, usually with some trepidation it has been confessed. It is probable that the young man comes from a prosperous family, and has known nothing of real poverty except in the impersonal way that comes from reading stories and accounts of suffering in the daily press. He will find his boy living with a large family in two or three rooms, where ventilation is unknown; where he wears poor clothes and seldom has a satisfying meal. In many cases the youngster has to work hours that would stagger many a grown man. The lad usually greets the big brother with much suspicion, and there is great difficulty in making him see that the visit is in his own interest and that the caller is not a probation officer. The visitor has to use much tact to get the youngster to talk about himself. Baseball has been one of the popular topics for the visitor to begin with. Probation officers do not talk baseball with delinquents, consequently one cause of suspicion is removed. The young man gets him to promise to come up to the Y. M. C. A. Building and see what they have there; he also invites him to his home or his room, and gradually a new life opens up for the boy that was heading for the reformatory or a career of crime. At the West Side Branch they have a special class in the gymnasium for the little brothers. When the first meetings were held, the young men saw that they had a big job on their hands. The youngsters were noisy, suspicious and nervous. But the instructor and his assistants worked as they never worked before, to excite the interest of the boys in the work in hand, to get them into orderly ways without oppressive measures, and give them some ideas of elementary hygiene. The results have been gratifying. They have acquired the desire to develop their bodies and appear as much as possible like their special big brother.

One big brother was given a case that was very pathetic. The boy he was given to look after he discovered had to be at work at five in the morning. At nine he went to school. At four in the afternoon he was at work again, and from that time on into the evening. The three dollars he earned a week had to go into the family purse, and there was no way in which he could secure the much coveted skates or base-ball. For several years he had had no holiday, and but few hours for play. He had become sullen and listless. The big brother got him a place to work where he got more pay, where he only worked from four to six o'clock in the afternoon, and had his Sundays. He has some extra work at the Y. M. C. A., and he is saving the money from this to go to pay his expenses at camp next summer. He is no longer sullen and suspicious, but a boy like other youths of his age who have had some chance to develop.

The big brother takes it upon himself to see that his charge has fun and entertainment of the right sort. The boy, if he has gone anywhere for amusement, has been to theatres of the lowest and cheapest description. What baseball games he has seen have been watched through a hole in the fence, one eye on the game and the other looking for the approach of the policeman, who is expected to charge down upon him at any moment. About once a week the two brothers plan to go somewhere for a good time, and the older man has often to repress his smiles at the wondering remarks of the younger. One of them was taken to hear a concert for the first time. The beauty of the hall filled him with awe, the tuning up of the orchestra with delight. When the leader began to wave his baton, the lad leaned over and said: "I suppose that man with the stick is one of this world's great men, isn't he?"

The boys are taken in parties to the "Zoo" to see the animals and to the Museum of Natural History. The questions poured into the ear of the leader make him go to the library on his return home, and read up before he attempts to explain again why the elephant wears a trunk, and why there are humps on the camel's back.

Some big brothers have become so ambitious that they have as many as three boys to look after. Their life then is no bed of roses, for while the ordinary man of family can train his boys from the start, the big brother has to begin after his boys have acquired the habits, the talk, the petty dishonesty of the street. It is an uphill task, but one that has proved fascinating to all those who have tried it, and they say they would not give it up for worlds. They say that they receive far more than they give, that they are taken out of themselves and find life far more interesting. A young man in a large city, if he comes from some other place, is apt to become self-centred, and needs something to occupy his mind after his regular work is done. Ordinary social life is not so easily taken up as in the place he came from. As a cure for lonesomeness and the blues they say there is nothing equal to "big brothering."

One young man, an artist who is quite successful in his profession, came to Mr. Powlison a short time ago and said that New York had done much for him—it had taught him his art, giving him a living and some fame, but that he himself had done nothing for New York. He asked for a boy so that he could make a good citizen out of him. He was given one, and the future citizen is developing into one of the finest young fellows for his years in the city.

The secretary was asked recently if the work for the boys proved successful in the majority of cases. He said that he would let the figures speak for themselves. Out of four hundred little brothers only four have proved a disappointment.

Mr. Powlison, who has charge of the religious work at the West Side Branch, is the power behind the throne. He has energized the whole movement, got the best men to serve in the organization as workers and officers, and there are few who come in contact with him who do not catch some of his hearty enthusiasm.

Mr. Powlison and his co-workers never lose sight of the fact for a moment that they are making themselves responsible for the moral and religious training of the boys as well as getting them on a higher mental and physical plane. The young men in charge live their religion in manly fashion, and the youngsters, always quick to observe, see that religion is something honored by manly men. As each one thinks his own guardian is about the finest man in the gymnasium, and as he is endeavoring to copy him in all things, he goes to the Sunday rallies, at first for the sake of the leader, and finally, the good music and good speaking weave their charm about him until he wants to be one of the regular attendants for his own sake. From this they gradually develop into active members of the Boys' Y. M. C. A., and extend a helping hand to some other lad who has not been so fortunate as to have had some big brother come down on the lower East or West Side and look after him.

INTO STILL WATERS

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

CHAPTER XVI

THAT first night in the basement home, after the Mont-Lawn visit, was not an easy one for Maggie. The room was hot and close, and she missed the pretty white bed with its smooth, cool sheets. For some time after Patty and the twins were asleep she lay and thought.

For ten whole days now she had been in that beautiful children's home. Some one, somewhere, had sent three dollars that she might have all that pleasure. All around her now were those who had not been to Mont-Lawn—men, women, boys and girls who scarcely knew what trees and grass and flowers meant. She could not bring back with her the trees and grass and flowers, to be sure; but she could be a little ray of sunshine herself, so the teacher had said. She could smile, and sing, and tell the stories she had heard, and besides—had she not given herself to the dear Jesus to be his little girl, and did not he want her to be cheerful and happy, and to make others so? The teacher had said that he did. And all alone in the dark on her corner of the old ragged quilt, Maggie whispered once more her bedtime prayer, before turning over and settling herself for sleep.

Breakfast was scanty the next morning. The co-operative household was hardly in running order as yet, and there was for breakfast only a little dry bread and milk donated by their neighbor on the other side of the room. The treasured three dollars had been tied to the Missionary's doorknob the night before, but even were it not gone, it is doubtful if one of the four children would have consented to its sacred completeness being broken by so sordid a thing as the abstraction of a dime for breakfast.

Patty and the twins were just about to fall upon their share of the bread and milk when Maggie raised a warning hand.

"Sh-h! Have ye forgot?" she demanded. "We didn't sing yet."

"Sing! Do ye reckon we could here?—jest us?" cried Patty.

"Sure!" declared Maggie. And she fearlessly started the song.

Over across the room Mrs. Whalen stopped scolding, and her husband stopped swearing. Even the children forgot to quarrel over their breakfast, and as the last sweet "God is great, and God is good" died into silence, there was a breathless hush in the room.

"Sure, an' it's a swate song ye're a-singin'," muttered Mrs. Whalen at last. "Sing it ag'in, kids!"

That was but the beginning. Before the week was out the landlady's children themselves had learned the song, and "Grace before meat" became a regular prelude to every meal in the Whalen home. Nor was this all. There were other songs and hymns that Maggie remembered, and in a wonderfully short time she had half the children of the neighborhood organized into a chorus that met every night at sunset for a "song service." She kept it up, too, until the cold evenings drove her indoors, and then she begged and usually obtained the loan of somebody's room for the meeting.

It was not all music and joy, however, for Maggie, Patty and the twins. The mere matter of living became a serious consideration, for some features of the co-operative housekeeping had to undergo a radical change. For instance, there was no more appropriating to one's self a pie set out on a window to cool, or a bottle of milk left too long on a doorstep. The rights of property-holders were better understood now than when Maggie purloined the four cookies and two slices of bread from the Mont-Lawn supper table.

There were still flowers to be made, errands to be run, and babies to be tended, however, yet the total income of the four children was small, and had it not been for the City Missionary's taking matters in hand no knowing to just what pass things might have come.

The City Missionary, however, did take matters in hand. The three dollars tied to her doorknob was used for Mont-Lawn, it is true, that the four generous givers might not be grieved by its return, but far more than its value found its way into the basement room in the shape of shoes, stockings and warm little coats and dresses, to say nothing of food.

Winter was coming on, and Maggie, Patty and the twins must go to school, so the Missionary said, and the Missionary seemed to know, for, sure enough, when winter did come, Maggie, Patty and the twins did go to school. A new world opened then to Maggie's eyes—a world where one learned all sorts of wonderful things, and where one had a beautiful young lady with a sweet smile to say "Good morning, dear," to one every day.

CHAPTER XVII

IT was June, and Houghtonsville was abloom with roses from one end of the village to the other. Even the big stone lions on either side of the steps at Five Oaks looked less forbidding against the red and green of the crimson rambler that trailed up the veranda posts; at all events, they seemed so to Doctor Spencer coming up the path toward the house. Perhaps Doctor Spencer's wishes colored his vision in a measure; certainly on this particular evening he would like to meet nothing that did not give him an encouraging smile.

The doctor had come on a special mission. Old Nathan and the mare were not waiting for him to-night. He had sent them home from the last stopping-place, and had walked the rest of the way to Five Oaks. He came now, not as a physician, but as a man—a man who was about to put to the test the dearest wish of his heart.

In the big rocking-chair on the veranda he waited for old Mrs. Barrett to go in search of her mistress; and as he sat there in the fragrant June twilight, he thought of the last eight months, and of what they had brought to him and to the woman for whom he was so impatiently waiting. At a light step on the graveled walk he sprang to his feet.

"I was in the garden," said Mrs. Kendall, a little hurriedly, as she ascended the steps; and Doctor Spencer wondered if all the color in her cheeks came from her haste.

Mrs. Kendall was in white—one of the changes the eight months had brought. Her lips and her eyes smiled—another change—and her slender figure had lost its listlessness. She came straight to the doctor and gave him her hand.

"You walked, doctor? I don't see old Nathan," she said.

"Yes, from the Hardings'. I—I wanted to see you."

There was a slight pause. Something in the man's voice had sent a quick flash of questioning to the eyes of the woman.

"Well?" she said gently, as she seated herself near him. "Is it old Tom, or Mrs. Barstow, doctor?"

The doctor drew a long breath, then, as was his habit, he plunged at once into his subject.

"Neither one," he returned, leaning forward in his chair so that he might look into her face. "I have come to tell you a story."

For a moment there was silence, then the doctor spoke again.

"Up on the hill, Mrs. Kendall, a widow is to-night—as she has been for months past—rejoicing in the return of a long-lost daughter. Beyond her a cripple is the happy owner of a new wheel-chair. At the other end of the village a lonely old woman is surrounded by every com-

rs. Kendall stirred, and her hands ered nervously in her lap.

Yes, I—I, too, have a story to tell," said in a low voice, turning her so that only the profile showed in dim light. "There was a woman who—who lost her little girl in a city. For a time the woman ght she would die. She even hoped she would. But she did not die—lived, and as she saw all around her and little children and happiness, grew hard and bitter. She came to it all with a terrible hatred—she hated God himself for taking her from her.

Then came a man—a strong, clear- man who looked straight into her rt and saw all the wickedness there, did he shudder nor turn away. He led first her body until, in spite of self, she was well and strong, and n he opened her eyes to the suffering ut her. He taught her that other s had their burden of sorrow even as at as her own, and he showed her t she might do to lighten those bur- s. It was in that way that she found lost God of her childhood—the God love and tenderness and mercy. It s in that way that she found, in a asure, peace."

The low voice paused and broke with last word. There was a moment's nce, then Mrs. Kendall turned and ed the man at her side.

"Doctor, I can't do what you ask— n't you see that I can't? You have n so good, so true, so patient—I n't want to cause you pain; but I n't do this thing—I can't! Somewhere this world is my little girl—I feel it; know it. She may be in misery and nt. I couldn't be happy while—"

The man at Mrs. Kendall's side leaned rward suddenly and caught her hands. "'Happy'? 'Happy'?" he cried eager- "Then you would be happy?"

"No, I didn't say—I didn't mean—" ttered the woman, hurriedly, with- awing her hands; then her whole man- changed. "Doctor Spencer," she be- n in a low voice that shook a little, made a decision yesterday. I am ing to New York. I am going to e among those people. I am going to e my life to them. I shall do what I n everywhere to relieve suffering, but ays I shall search for my lost darling. metime, somewhere, I may find her; t if I do not, some other mother's rling will be the happier for my esence, I hope."

"No, no," begged the doctor, earnestly. "You are not well enough, not strong enough yet. Let me search. Let me try once more. Let me go alone, I beg of you. Surely you will grant me this?"

Mrs. Kendall hesitated; then she rose to her feet and extended both her hands.

"Go," she said gently. "And may God go with you!"

For one long minute the man gazed straight into the woman's eyes; then he reverently kissed the hands he held and turned away.

All the way home the doctor's heart sung within him. It was "happy" she would be with him—she had said it herself; and to the doctor it seemed at the moment a simple thing to search out every little girl in the world and ask her name, her history, and the color of her hair and eyes!

CHAPTER XVIII

NO time was lost by the doctor in beginning his quest, and from the very start he had a definite plan of action mapped out. Shrewdly suspecting that Mrs. McGinnis had not told all that she knew, he determined to begin with her, surmising that he might gain some facts not given to Mrs. Kendall, and well understanding that alone he could make a much more exhaustive search of the slums of New York than when with a frail, sensitive woman. Very promptly, therefore, he arranged to be absent from Houghtonsville for an indefinite time, and when all was in readiness he went to Mrs. McGinnis at the farmhouse on the hill.

"I want you to tell me, please," he began abruptly, "everything you can remember about little Margaret Kendall, and how she came to you."

Mrs. McGinnis shifted her position uneasily. A swift red showed in her cheeks.

"My Bobby brought her, sir. She stayed a week and—and then she went away."

"Yes, but why did she go away?"

There was no answer.

"Why did she go away, Mrs. McGinnis?" repeated the man.

"Doctor Spencer, I don't know anythin' about that poor little lamb; if I did I'd have told ye long ago," burst out the woman, agitatedly. "Do ye s'pose I'd have kept anythin' from poor Mis' Kendall, after all she's done for me, if I knew anythin' that would do any good? Do ye, doctor?"

"No," returned the man, quietly, "But I think you have kept something from Mrs. Kendall that you imagine would not do her any good to know."

Mrs. McGinnis was silent.

"And it's that very thing," went on the doctor, "that I'm here to-day to find out. Won't you tell me, please?"

"I can't, doctor."

"Why not?"

"It wouldn't do no good."

"That is your opinion, Mrs. McGinnis; mine might be different, if I knew the facts. If you love Mrs. Kendall as you say you do; if you are as grateful to her as you say you are, you will not hold back one thing, Mrs. McGinnis. I have begun the search now, and I am going to New York alone. What you tell me need not come to Mrs. Kendall's ear, perhaps, but it is absolutely necessary that I know the whole truth. Now tell me the whole story, Mrs. McGinnis, straight from the beginning."

There was a moment's hesitation, then Mrs. McGinnis bowed her head.

"I'll tell you," she said faintly, "but you'll see 'tain't much, after all. Bobby found her cryin' in the street, an' they went to the Grand Central an' left the note; then he brought her home. That much you know. Bobby told me he thought her mother was the lady that was knocked down in the street. He said he reckoned she was dead. When Jack, my husband, come home, he was half drunk, an' he said he was goin' ter let old Sullivan have her to work for him."

EASY, ECONOMICAL SANITARY SWEEPING

It is a recognized fact that when sweeping is based upon the theory that dust is a carrier of disease, that it is at once the greatest necessity in sweeping, as the dust-vehicle of germs—that so many well-intended sweepings with a corn broom. Slavery or Freedom*

ROUGHLY stated, the slave is a man who is under bondage, a man who may be compelled to do what he does not wish to do, who does not belong to himself and who has not the rights of ordinary humanity. The form of slavery we once knew in this country is by no means the only form of the evil. The negro is emancipated, but slavery is still prevalent in its modified form. There is the slavery of poverty. No one who moves much among the poor escapes the sight of it. Men and women who toil from early morning till late at night for the bread they eat; who live in miserable close rooms, and seldom get an opportunity to breathe God's free air. Probably there are many of them who have to work harder than any negro ever worked in the South. Then there are voluntary slaves, whose affection for wife and family holds them to store or office, lest those they love suffer want.

Worse than any of these is the slavery of a man to his own appetites and passions. He is more despicable than any other man because he is self-enslaved. He has sold himself into servitude and has made the worst of all bad bargains. Whether he be a drunkard, or an opium victim, or a sensualist, he has given up his freedom and is driven by his master like the ox to the slaughter. The most pathetic of all stories is that of this kind of slave. He tells of his struggle to free himself, of the energy of his efforts and of the failure that follows every mutiny. We think him foolish to yield, yet did we know his heroism we would respect him in spite of his failures.

It is strange that even a slave so besotted will sometimes call the total abstainer a coward and charge him with being under bondage. He is tied up, so we are told, so that he cannot drink a glass of wine, so that he cannot be sociable. Would that every young man could see that such bondage is true freedom — that there is no conquest so glorious as that of the man whose passions and appetites are under control! The slavery of the man who fears to do wrong, who fears to yield to temptation, who fears to displease God, is not slavery, but freedom.

Unreaped Harvests†

WHAT a humiliating thought it is that our Lord should see a field ready for spiritual harvest and no one to reap and garner it! The disciples to whom he showed such a field might be excused for not doing the work or even perceiving that it was waiting to be done, but the church in these days cannot make that excuse. We know as they did not the signs of harvest, and we know better than they the power that goes with the reaper. The records of nineteen centuries are in our hands, of fields that have been reaped by men who went out to do the work in Christ's strength, and we have seen that the humblest instruments, if fully consecrated to him, can accomplish great things. Therefore the fault and the negligence are inexcusable if the great harvest is left to rot on the land.

Christ did his part in the great task. He spared not himself. He went to the uttermost extremity, laying down his life that the world might be saved. All that he asked of his followers was to make the fact known. To every one who would engage in that work he promised special aid. The Holy Spirit would accompany the message, carrying it to the heart and giving it power, the very power of God. Nothing more could be done to encourage the laborer but the promise of reward, and that he gave with divine liberality: "He that reapeth receiveth wages and gathereth fruit unto life eternal." An ever-increasing host has inherited that reward, and now "the promise is to us and to our children."

What an incentive to labor this is! There are fields waiting in heathen lands where the laborers are still few. In civilized lands there are vast fields still untouched, for all our cities contain some souls utterly ignorant of Christ. Nearer still, there are the families of nominal Christians, who in all too many instances have never been personally sought by any earnest reaper. Shall Christ wait in vain for the service of those whom he has saved that they may save others?

President and Naturalists

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, who is always ready to break a lance for truth's sake, has excited a stir among the writers of "nature books," several of whom he bluntly accuses of "romancing." In a recent magazine article Mr. Roosevelt claims that many of the stories attributing wonderful feats to animals are pure invention. He says that no man who has not made a personal study of animals is qualified to write concerning them, and that special care should be taken to keep out of our school-books those fictions of animal life, which, when told not as fiction but as fact, mislead the youthful mind and give a wholly wrong impression of the animal world.

His caustic criticism has stirred up a hornet's nest, but the President's views are corroborated by the venerable naturalist John Burroughs and several other eminent authorities who have publicly declared the points well made. Mr. Burroughs gives as illustrations of the objectionable class of statements to which the President refers the story of a "caribou cemetery" in Labrador, where all the caribou went to die; the incident of the eagle who caught her falling nestlings midair on her wings; that of the porcupine that stuck its quills full of dried apples which it carried off to its den; that of the wild-fowl which bound up its broken leg with splints, and also a weird tale of a "white" wolf that bit a bull-moose's heart in two. Such stories, Mr. Burroughs declares, are wholly unsupported by such distinguished naturalists as Thoreau, Audubon, White and others.

more than one), a school has been started, the people conform to the discipline of the church, and there are no factions."

He adds that in one field there were a short time ago only five Christians, while there are now 250 Christians and two churches. Of another section he says: "Last year there were only twenty Christians and this year there are one hundred cared for and developed."

Another striking incident is the following: "There was a man in the village of Oktu, who was interested in the Gospel. The workers sought him out. He proved to be a gentleman, but his interest had been exaggerated. However, they proceeded to interest him, and soon his sarang (guest room) was overflowing with other gentlemen, real yangbans (high class) who wanted to meet the two guests. And they poured out the truths of salvation so well that the Spirit came down in power, and in a few days thirteen men were pledged for Christ, all yangbans, several of them scholars. Such an ingathering was never known in South Kyeng Sang Province. And this in a country where there was not one believer."

Passing Through the Sea

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THOUGH they were forewarned, yet when Pharaoh drew nigh to them on the shore of the Red Sea, the children of Israel "were sore afraid." They lifted up their eyes, not like Moses, who "endured as seeing him who is invisible." They lifted up their eyes on the things which are seen and temporal (II. Cor. 4: 18). They saw the Egyptians, the chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen, his power, and how near to them he was coming; they judged according to the sight of their eyes, in spite of the word which the Lord had spoken. Only Moses trusted God, and to him the position was not one of danger, because God was in charge, and he knew that God was mightier than Pharaoh. All the plagues of Egypt had not sufficed to teach the people this.

"The children of Israel cried out unto the Lord" (v. 10), but they dealt with man, and bitterly reproached Moses. They said unto him, "Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? Wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt? Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians, than that we should die in the wilderness." Where was the man who, forty years before, had been so shocked and surprised that his brethren did not understand that God by his hand was giving them deliverance (Acts 7: 25, R.V.)? Where was the man who again and again argued with his God, in his fear that his people would not believe?

A great change had come over Moses. The man, once "mighty in words and in deeds" (Acts 7: 22), had become "very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth" (Num. 12: 3). The lamb had taken possession of him; he had understood something of the Lamb of God; and instead of defending himself against the unjust and untrue accusations of the people, he ignored himself, and comforted those who injured him.

"Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show to you to-day; for the Egyptians whom ye have seen to-day, ye shall see them again no more forever. The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." We only have power with others in the measure in which all that is personal is put quite out of the question. The children of Israel must learn to stand still, that they might learn, later on, to go forward. Every step forward is the result of having learned to trust God in a moment of peril or difficulty. The people, having learned this lesson, got their marching orders. "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward. But lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea, and divide it."

In order that the people may go forward, the man who stands near to God must exercise his faith in the difficulties and impossibilities of the situation. Again the Lord repeats to Moses his programme and the end of his dealings: "And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I have gotten me honor upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen."

And now the angel of the Lord, in the pillar of cloud and of fire, changed his position; he had gone before the people (chap. 13: 21, 22); now he "removed and went behind them." He came between them and the Egyptians. To the latter "it was cloud and darkness;" to God's own people it "gave light by night, so that the one came not near the other all the night." God's presence is cloud and darkness to those who know nothing of the slain Lamb, but it is light to his redeemed and saved ones.

Any Woman Can Have Good Health, a Refined Face and Good Figure

MANY a woman has surprised her husband and friends by giving 15 minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to special directions which I give to her for the care of health, face and figure. Over 20,000 women have studied themselves under my direction in the past five years.

Are You Tired of Drugs?

I use no drugs. I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercise for nerves and muscles controlling such organs, bring a good circulation of warm blood which I purify by teaching correct breathing and by prescribing the special diet, bathing, etc., adapted to each individual. I strengthen all your vital organs, lungs, heart, nerve centers and send your blood bounding through your veins as when a child.

Clear Skin and a Good Figure

I develop or reduce your figure to correct proportions. I teach you to stand and to walk with an ease and dignity which at once bespeak culture and refinement.

Every figure can be rounded out symmetrically unless bones are missing or tissues entirely wasted away, and the woman who carries from 20 to 100 pounds of superfluous flesh every time she moves has my sympathy—but she does not need to do so—and surely it is every woman's privilege and duty to keep herself attractive and pleasing.

Questions and Answers

M. K. H., Roxbury, Mass. What language do the natives of Switzerland speak?

The official languages are French, German and Italian, three-fourths of the people speaking German. In the Swiss national parliament, the members use both French and German, and public documents are printed in both languages, according to the proximity of the people to each country.

E. J. C., Austin, Minn. Will OUR MAIL-BAG tell me the reason why the number 13 is considered unlucky by superstitious persons?

We have already stated repeatedly that the origin of the superstition is supposed to be the Last Supper, at which the thirteenth was the betrayer of our Lord. The belief in the number being unlucky, however, antedates Christianity by centuries. Norse mythology says that at a banquet given to the twelve gods of Valhalla, Loki, the god of strife and evil, intruded, and that at his instigation the god of peace was killed. The Turks so dislike the number that it is almost expunged from their vocabulary. It is said that in Paris no house bears the number.

M. J. C., Akron, O. Is the art of embalming now in use the same as that used by the ancient Egyptians?

It is not. Bodies which are embalmed nowadays will not be preserved for more than a few years at most; very many of those the Egyptians embalmed before the birth of Christ are still so perfect that the lines of the faces are as clearly marked as when they were first embalmed. The valuable secret is lost.

A. S., Garner, Iowa. What is the Sabbath day's journey mentioned in Acts 1:12?

It was two thousand paces, equivalent to about a mile. The distance was fixed by the Jewish teachers as the limit beyond which the Jew must not walk on the Sabbath day. They easily found ways of evading the law by making pauses at the end of every mile and in other ways. The distance is supposed to have been fixed by reference to the years of wandering. From the edge of the camp to the Tabernacle standing in the centre, to which every man might go, was supposed to be a mile.

Here is a letter from a little maid who has helped the little sufferers in China:

I send one dollar for the China Famine Fund. I am a little girl ten years old and I felt sorry for the poor children in China. I made doll bonnets and aprons and sold them to get the amount I am sending. I sent two dollars before, which I earned taking care of mamma when she was sick.

Perry Shafer, Cunningham, Kan. Did our Saviour authorize any change from the seventh day to the Sunday Sabbath?

Not that we know. There was no occasion for him to do so. If you read his life as contained in the four Gospels, you will see that he was continually assailed by people, very much like some in our day, who were trying to hold him to the letter of the law, criticizing his healing on the Sabbath, and harassing him generally about violating the fourth commandment. He went his way unheeding, saying, "The Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath." Some of his Judaizing followers tried after his death to fix the burden, with the rest of the Jewish law, on the Gentiles, but it failed. The apostles in solemn council stated (Acts 15: 28, 29) what parts of the law were binding on the Gentiles, and nothing was said in that list about keeping the seventh day. So the practice of keeping the first day sprang up, and Paul told any one who was criticized for doing it: "Let no man judge you as to the . . . Sabbath day" (Col. 2: 16).

Reader, Passaic, N. J. The Red Cross Society has announced that it will no longer receive contributions for the Chinese famine sufferers, the food cargoes on the Buford and Logan—which have now reached Shanghai—being sufficient for all needs until the new crops are ready. The crops are ripening rapidly. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S China Relief Fund closed May 31.

Inquirer, Omaha, Neb. If the Bible prohibits Christians marrying non Christians, why are there such rules as those in I. Cor. 7: 14-16?

In those passages and others of similar tenor, Paul was addressing people who were thinking of making difference of religion an excuse for divorce or separation. As a result of his preaching the husband or the wife had been converted. They wanted to know what they should do. His reply was that if the non-Christian chose to go, he or she should be allowed to go, but if they chose to stay, the Christian should be content to continue the union

Miss E. H. F., Glasco, Kan. How many conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn will there be before 1910? When and where will they be?

I have received two letters from different persons asking this question. I wrote immediately to the Naval Observatory requesting an answer. I had estimated and partly guessed that the two planets would be in conjunction once in about twenty years, but not knowing when they were last, I could not predict when it would occur again. In reply received to-day the professor says: "By a rough calculation the next geocentric conjunction will occur the latter part of August, 1921, and the mean intervals between their conjunctions occur regularly every 19.88 years." J. H. B., Peoria, Ill. Does God create evil, as Isaiah says (Isa. 45:7)?

He sends punishment, which the Jews, for whom Isaiah wrote, regarded as evil. If they behaved, if they kept God's law, Isaiah told them, God would send peace. This was a blessing, as they realized; but they did not realize that it came from God. If they disobeyed him and turned to idols, he would send war and exile (the opposite of peace) and that too came from God. They were to understand that in God was the source and origin of both good and evil fortune, as they understood the words.

Exeter Hall, London, Soon to be Demolished

THERE is probably no other building in the world better known to the religious public of two continents than Exeter Hall, which stands in London's busy Strand. For many years it has been the headquarters of the Central Young Men's Christian Association, and there the leaders of religious and social life have attended at the birth of important and far-reaching movements. Time has left its relentless imprint on the ancient structure, and the Y. M. C. A. has decided to erect a new building, and so Exeter Hall, in the course of a few months, will be but a memory of the past, for it is the purpose of the purchasers to demolish it. Exeter Hall was erected in 1829. On its platform have stood men like Buxton, Clarkson, Lloyd Garrison, Sturge, and Wilberforce. Nearly thirty years ago, it was rumored that it was to be converted into a theatre or hotel, and several gentlemen, well known in Christian circles, purchased the hall and presented it to the Young Men's Christian Association. Altogether a million dollars will be required to build and equip a building that will meet the needs of London's young men. J. K. M.

Miss Addie H., Owensboro, Ky., writes:

We infer from your letter that the secret sin was against God. If so, we do not see what useful pur can be served by public confession. Mr. A. M. C., Belchertown, Mass., sends us this ridd with the suggestion that some reader of the MAIL-B may be able to solve it:

God made Adam out of dust, but thought it best to make me fir
So I was made before the man, to answer God's most holy plan.
My body God did make complete, but without arms or legs or fe
My ways and acts he did control, but to my body gave no soul.

A living being I became, and Adam gave to me my name;
I from his presence then withdrew, and more of Adam never kne
I did my Maker's law obey, nor from it ever went astray.
Thousands of miles I go in fear, but seldom on the earth appear.

For purpose wise which God did see, he put a living soul in me.
A soul from me my God did claim, and took from me that soul agai
For when from me my soul had fled, I was the same as when fir made;
And without hands or feet or soul, I travel on from pole to pole.

I labor hard by day and night; to fallen men I give great light.
Thousands of people, young and old, will by my death great ligh behold.
No right nor wrong can I conceive, the Scriptures I cannot believe
Although my name therein is found, they are to me but empt sound.

No fear of death doth trouble me, real happiness I ne'er shall see
To heaven I shall never go, nor to the grave, nor hell below.
Now when these lines you closely read, go search your Bible wit all speed,
For that my name is written there I honestly to you declare.

S. M. L., Scranton, Pa. A friend insists that in England the Methodist Church is becoming extinct. Can you tell me i there is any truth in this statement?

It is very far from the truth. Both the Wesleyan and the Primitive branches of the church are very large and influential. Your friend probably bases his statement on the figures published by the recent conference. They show a marked decrease in the number of members. Comparing the list with that of last year, we find that there is a decrease for the year of about two thousand full members, and of about six thousand candidates for membership. This may be due to several causes of a transitory character and by no means indicates a collapse.

J. C. W., Knoxville, Tenn. Was not the expression in the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church," intended as an endorsement of the Roman Catholic Church?

No, simply of the general Church of Christ, the entire body of believers united in him as its living head. We still speak of the Catholic Epistles, that is, the Epistles of James, Peter, John and Jude, which were not addressed to the Church in any one place, but to the Church universal.

CENTRAL AMERICA'S WAR CLOUD

It would seem as if the dogs of war are no sooner quieted in one part of the globe than they are straining at the leash in some other place where the difficulties between nations seem likely to set full cry into the field once more. This time they growling along the desolate border that divides co from Guatemala, and at the present moment os from both countries are being hurried to the . The relations of the two countries are so ned that war may be in progress before this strikes eye of the reader. If it does not occur there will n all probability, a revolution soon in Guatemala. resident Cabrera of Guate- has been carrying things a high hand in his dealings his fellow countrymen h, to do him justice, may been to a certain extent ssary, and also with his erful neighbor at the north. enemies say that he plans ecome permanent dictator he destinies of his country; thing that has been planned revious presidents in South erica, and an idea that has ably entered Cabrera's d at different times in his ny career. A year ago President Barillas of Guate- la was murdered on the ets of a Mexican town by an who claimed he was a temalan. The revolutionary ion which had sought refuge Mexico at once declared, ugh probably with small h, that the assassination had n instigated or carried out the knowledge of Cabrera, that he was anxious to rid of the ex-president, as was a menace to his own con- ance in power. As Barillas was without funds and ted by sickness, looking more like a man of eighty n sixty-two, it is not likely that the Guatemalan sident considered him dangerous to his own adminis- ion, or had any interest in seeing his former rival out of the way. It must be remembered, however, t politics in Central America bear a marked resem- nce to the politics of the sixteenth century, rather n of the twentieth. Incidents recorded in such novels Soldiers of Fortune are not infrequent.

Mexico asked for the extradition of Colonel DeLima, of Guatemala, who was alleged to be the chief conspirator. There is no treaty covering extradition between the two countries, and Mexico got a flat refusal from President Cabrera.

Some time ago the life of President Cabrera was attempted in a remarkable manner. A box of iron was filled with explosives and placed beneath the roadway over which the president frequently passed on his way from the Palace to the Hall of Congress. A wire was run from a near-by house to carry the electric current that exploded the charge. Two mines of similar design were constructed later. At least one of them was exploded when the president passed, but he was uninjured. The affair caused the wildest excitement in the Guatemalan capital, as the revolutionists had been plotting constantly, and public sentiment had been greatly wrought up.

A Festival Day at President Cabrera's Capital

It is claimed by a number of Guatemalans that President Cabrera arranged the plot against himself, in order to get the sympathy of his own countrymen, and to secure that of the governments of neighboring countries. This report was spread abroad within two days after the alleged attempt. Nevertheless, in accordance with international courtesy and usage, he received notes of congratulation on his narrow escape from the representatives of the various countries which have legations at Guatemala City. These notes, under their thin veneer of politeness, lacked the ring of sincerity that would have been there if people had been convinced that President Cabrera's life had really been attempted in such dastardly fashion. The only explosives used, according to telegraphic dispatches, were some dozens of large powder caps, capable of making a great noise and some smoke, but which would not have sufficient force to blow up anything.

The president at once ordered the arrest of a large number of suspects. All were released except nineteen. Among the number held for trial were two citizens of Mexico. They were found guilty by the court. The penalty for the crime is death, but capital sentences must be confirmed by the president. It was said that Cabrera would use the occasion to show his generosity to the world and that he would pardon the condemned men, and thus restore public confidence in himself. The entire diplomatic corps attended the trial. As no Americans were concerned, Secretary of State Root refused to allow our representative to join in the protest that was made by the ministers against the sentence.

The people of Mexico were at once deeply stirred by the dangerous plight of their fellow-countrymen. Their condemnation was considered as a great national affront. President Diaz, of Mexico, never a man to lose his head in a crisis, was not stampeded by the popular clamor for war, but began to bring strong pressure to bear through diplomatic channels. At the same time he sent word to the commanders of the various divisions of the Mexican army to prepare their men for campaign. In Mexico this is not the long, hard task that it would be in many countries. The military spirit has always been strong in Mexico. Cortez found a fighting race there and the profession of arms from his day to ours has always been held in high regard. The Mexican army is one of the best equipped

Universal Brotherhood

TEXT: Ecclesiastes 3:8

"And a time of peace"

THOUGH the huge, horrible, yet fascinating leonine statue moulded from captured French cannon is seen from every spot upon the battlefield of Waterloo, there is one incident about that statue with which many may not be conversant. Some years ago, a little sparrow, feeling the yearnings of motherhood tugging at her heart, went to that statue to prepare a nursery for her coming offspring. She flew to the gaping mouth of that lion. There she gathered her straw and leaves, and plucked the feathers from her breast and built a nest. There she laid her eggs and reared her young. There she lived in the presence of that whole battlefield, as the emblem of the Dove of Peace stopping the mouth of angry hate with the love of a universal brotherhood. Have you ever read of a more beautiful symbol of the coming of the millennium when wars shall cease, than that symbol which is found in the noted artist's picture where he has painted a dove nesting in the gaping mouth of an old cannon?

The Peace Conference

There has never come a time since the world stood when that little bird building her nest in the wide-open mouth of the old lion upon the battlefield of Waterloo was more appropriate as a lesson of peace than just now. All civilized nations are one in purpose to make a never-ceasing war upon war, until the old grizzled veteran Mars has been wiped off the face of the earth. The great nations of the world are building their huge battleships not for conquest, but to guarantee peace. The President has united with the Czar in an invitation to the European powers to send their delegates to the Peace Conference about to convene in the capitol of The Hague. Leading men in statecraft, in finance, in educational institutions and in pulpit, in the spring of 1907 met in New York City to help on the great cause of a universal brotherhood. What do all these signs of the times mean? Do they mean that certain nations are trying to throw other nations off their guard and pounce upon their possessions? Do they mean that the old, deceitful language of the diplomat is the language in vogue to-day? Nay. They mean that deep down in the human heart there is an inexpressible yearning to blunt the sword of war. They mean that all the enlightened men and women of this time are looking upon war as the most blasting curse of the ages. Now, the purpose of this sermon is to show how our nation, as well as other nations, can most quickly speed the day when war shall be no longer, and when nations shall clasp hands with nations in a binding and unbreakable fraternity.

What are the foundation stones upon which the nations of the world are going to raise the great Temple of Perpetual Peace? We have read in the newspapers how a noted American philanthropist is to erect a building at the Hague and call it the Palace of Peace, wherein the governments of the world can send their representatives to assemble for international conclave. But the Temple of Perpetual Peace has to be builded out of a more enduring substance than that of mortar and brick and stone. It has to be a spiritual temple as well as a material one. It has to be one which the cannon of the world cannot bombard, and whose walls cannot be tumbled down by any grappling-hooks. Thus, as we attempt to rear to-day the spiritual walls of the great white Temple of Perpetual Peace, we must first quarry out of the heart of God's huge mountain of truth the great foundation stones of justice.

Foundation Stones

Among the ruins of old Baalbek we find the largest stones of the world. In the cyclopean wall of the original Phœnician temple of Baal, we find three of those stones, each over sixty feet in length and fourteen feet square. In the quarries near to old Baalbek is one stone much larger than any which those ancient builders have dragged forth from the place in which they were formed. But I want to tell you that these huge foundation stones of old Baalbek are not as strong and enduring as the great foundation stones of justice with which the nations of the world are yet to build their Temple of Perpetual Peace. James G. Blaine, in one of his great speeches, once declared that "no question is ever decided permanently, unless it is decided justly." So have spoken some of the mightiest statesmen of the ages. You cannot build the Temple of Perpetual Peace, unless the foundation stones on the east side of it, and on the west side of it, and on the north side of it, and the south of it are the unbreakable stones of eternal justice.

This fact was never more powerfully taught than in the letter of salutation which President Theodore Roosevelt sent to the Peace Conference which assembled in New York City in April, 1907: "First and foremost, I beseech you to remember that, though it is our bounden duty to work for peace, yet it is even more our duty to work for righteousness and justice. It is righteousness that exalts a nation, and though normally peace is the handmaid of righteousness, yet if they are ever at odds, it is righteousness whose cause we must espouse." There never were truer words spoken. The prophet of old spoke well when he said there is no need of crying "Peace, peace, peace!" when there is no peace. Neither is there any Gospel sense in declaring that nations as individuals should live at peace with each other, when certain nations are murderers and thieves. When a man is a thief or a murderer, he should be shut up in jail or hung for his crime. And when a nation as an individual is a thief or a murderer, that nation should be punished and made to do right, and if such a nation will not heed the laws of justice, then it should be stripped of its power to disturb the world's peace. You cannot have a true, binding peace, unless the golden bands which bind nation to nation are moulded and purified and tempered by the fires of truth and justice.

International Tribunals

Now, how are the nations of the world to be made to be just to each other? How are the strong nations to be compelled to respect the rights of the weaker nations? How is a great nation, like the British Empire, with her hundreds of huge battleships and cruisers and her mighty armies, to be kept from trampling upon the rights of a Chilian Republic, or a nation like the United States to be kept from swallowing up a Canadian province? In a very simple way. The stronger and the more powerful nations of the world are to be kept from doing an injustice to the weaker nations in exactly the same way that the rich and powerful men of a nation are kept from doing an injustice to the peasantry of that nation. Suppose I am a poor farmer, living in a little hut and earning an humble living upon a five-acre piece of ground. Then supposing a very rich man comes into my part of the country, and buys up large tracts of land to make there an immense landed estate. Then supposing that rich man comes to me and says, "Farmer Talmage, I want to buy your land. It is situated in the place where I wish to build my new palace." Then, supposing I refuse to sell, and some dark night, that rich land-owner sends his men to oust me forcibly from my home and burn my little hut and outhouses, and kill my cow and mule and pigs and chickens. What can I do? Shall I get a gun and go and camp out in the mountains and lie around in the swamps, and some night steal up to that rich man's palace and shoot him and his children? Do I gather all my relatives together and start a vendetta upon that rich man and his relatives, as some families have done in the wild mountains of Tennessee and old Kentucky? No. I go straight down to a court of law. I get out a warrant for that man's arrest. Then an officer goes up to that rich man's house with that warrant, and he walks into the rich man's bedroom and places his hand upon that rich man's shoulder and politely says, "My friend, I do not care whether you have a thousand or ten thousand employees! I do not care whether your house is chuck full of rifles and pistols and swords and cannons. I do not care whether you have as much gold as Monte Cristo. I come to bring you before the court of justice. If you have wronged that poor farmer Talmage, to jail you will go, and a reparation for the destroyed home you will have to make. The authorities of the law have sent me to bring you into that court of justice." The rich men, in the sight of law, have no more rights than the poorest of the poor.

The World's Great Curse

Now, as men and women have banded themselves together in governmental organizations to protect the rights of the individual, so the nations of the world in the near future will band themselves together to protect the rights of each other. You may not live to see the "International Peace Union," but your children or children's children will surely see it. These nations of the world, the strong as well as the weak, will come together and say, "War is the most expensive curse of the ages. It drains from a nation's vitals its best blood. It takes away its most enormous capital and stagnates its industries. It brutalizes and debases all the nobler and purer thoughts of its inhabitants. Therefore we cannot afford to go to war as a nation, any more than we can afford as individuals to protect our homes with the stiletto and with the murderer's pistol. We will therefore unite in an international compact and consent all nations to have their international difficulties adjudicated by a Board of Arbitration." You think I am indulging in an iridescent dream? I tell you that the International Court of Arbitration is coming in this century just as surely as the world lives. The sentiments of the human race are moving toward this glorious consummation with the rapidity of a whirlwind. If a nation can rule its own subjects by a court of law, the nations of the world in the same way will protect each other's rights by an International Court of Arbitration. And that court will be formed, if not in this day, surely in the lives of our children's children. I grant that, like Simeon of old, we may live to see the consummation of this blessing, and have a part in the dedication of this great "Temple of International Justice and Perpetual Peace."

Good Will to Men

But there are two or three great causes which are hastening on the formation of this Arbitration Court. The one is the humanitarian succor which our nation and other nations are sending to foreign lands in time of earthquake tragedy, and fire and flood and famine. It is the warm, sympathetic hand of fraternal love which one nation holds out to another nation in time of financial and domestic misfortunes. In other words, on an enlarged scale, it is the same kind of fraternal help which we find in the country districts when the farmers are willing to go and help a farmer in misfortune or family bereavement. And these lessons of international humanitarianism are taking place on every side of us.

No sooner did the earthquake of 1906 grip the mighty buildings of San Francisco and shake their walls, as a terrier would shake the life out of a rat, and the flames changed three-fourths of that city into a funeral pyre, than King Edward and Emperor William and Emperor Nicholas cabled their sympathies, and London and Berlin and Sydney and Melbourne and Quebec and Toronto started relief funds. No sooner was the island of Jamaica in the grip of the same kind of an earthquake, and its capital of Kingston a-choke with corpses of men and women and children and beasts and wrecked homes, than Rear Admiral Davis of the United States squadron landed his sailors with their arms loaded with clothes and bread-stuffs, and the American surgeons came with their nurses and all went to work as they went to the help of poor, prostrated Galveston after its fatal tidal wave of a few years ago. And when the British Governor of that island wrote a short letter to the commander of the American forces, he was not only excoriated by the British residents of the island, but he was practically recalled by the Home Office at London, while all the editors of the British kingdom sounded forth their encomiums of the noble self-sacrificing work of their American cousins across the seas. No sooner did the great Irish famine begin to starve the emerald island of Robert Emmet, than collections were taken in all the American churches for the sufferers, and A. T. Stewart, the New York merchant, chartered a boat and filled it with food, and the glorious American flag started across the Atlantic to conquer a people, not by sword, but by food and bread, not with the clenched fist of hate, but by the open palm of love.

Help for Starving Russia

When the awful Russian famine of 1892 started on its deadly work, Louis Klopsch, through his great religious paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sounded forth the clarion call for help. Thousands upon thousands of dollars poured in. Literally, a great stream of gold emptied itself into New York City. The money was cabled abroad. Then the good ship Leo was chartered by Dr. Klopsch and loaded down to the gunwales with food. Not one gaping cannon was frowning over her sides, but without gun, or battle-ax, or battering-ram that great boat went forth on her mission of conquest. The Emperor Alexander welcomed her and those highest in official position. Everywhere, up and down the streets of starving Russia, and up in the mountains and down in the valleys, the cry went, "Bread! Bread! Thank God for bread! Bread! Bread! Bread from America! Thank God for bread!" Then came the great India famines of 1897 and 1900. The same scenes were again repeated. But now THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent a squadron instead of one ship. The United States Government said, "Oh, ye angels of

MRS. McKINLEY PASSES AWAY

N Sunday, the twenty-sixth of May, Mrs. Ida McKinley, widow of "the martyr President," peacefully passed to life eternal. Mrs. McKinley had been stricken with a slight attack lexy a few days previous to her death, her con- rapidly becoming so serious that the physician ng her summoned Surgeon-General Rixey from gton to the residence in Canton, Ohio, endeared istress by its hallowed associations with the past. ope of the invalid's recovery was entertained e beginning, and even those who loved her best rejoice that the lonely mourner has gone to re- husband whose constantly protecting care was lenly and tragically withdrawn. Among her terances, as repeated by an attendant, were the words: "Why should I linger? He is gone and ark to me now."

ediate members of both her own and the late nt's family were at her bedside, Secretary of the ry Cortelyou also arriving before the end came— which she anticipated with longing in a moment sciousness, saying: "Please, God, if it is thy hy defer it?"

McKinley's life of almost sixty years has been familiar to the nation. Born in 1847, in Canton, daughter of the banker James A. Saxton, she eared in a home of affluence, pursuing her edu- in a private school in Delhi, N. Y., later in and, and "finishing"—the accustomed phrase of ladies of that day—in the Brook Hill Seminary lia, Pa. Mr. Saxton believed that all young peo- re happier in a life of usefulness; hence, upon ughter's return to her Canton home, she became shier of the Stark County Bank, owned by her . Soon began the love story which has since won verence of every household in our land—a story of rous devotion which never flagged through the ears of widening interests and public service on e hand, while upon the other existed a confirmed lism growing out of grief like that of "Rachel, ing for her children."

pretty incident is related of those early days: McKinley, then a rising lawyer, was also the superintendent of a Methodist Sunday School; the young bank cashier, though the belle of her native town, found time to teach a class in the Presbyterian Sunday School, and the two were in the habit of walking together toward their respective destinations. One Sunday, coming to the corner where they must separate, the stalwart soldier-lawyer said: "I don't like these partings; I think we ought not to part after this." "So do I," replied she; in 1870 their married life began, and until President McKinley was struck down by the hand of an assassin, more than thirty years thereafter, brief and rare were the separations of the wedded pair. For this comparatively unbroken companionship Mrs. McKinley gave up her home life, living contentedly in hotels and traveling thousands of miles in sleeping cars during the quarter-century of her husband's political career, in spite of a physical weakness which might well have daunted any but a woman of strong character. The two daughters, Ida and Katie, born during their early married life, died in childhood within six months of each other, and the sorrowing mother never recovered from the double loss; her shattered health baffled the physicians, and she never walked again without assistance.

But that assistance was always by her side. The writer recalls with distinctness an illustrative episode witnessed on the bright morning previous to that awful day when President McKinley was foully done to death. It was "President's Day" in Buffalo, and the beloved and honored head of the nation, with his frail little wife close beside him, stood upon the stand erected in the Court of Fountains of the Pan-American Exposition grounds receiving the plaudits of the multitude who had gathered in the esplanade to hear what was afterward pronounced one of the President's most able addresses. Standing there in the September sunshine, full of the vigor of a clean and robust manhood, listening to the ringing cheers of the thousands who represented the people whom he loved and served—in the zenith of his success and power, President McKinley turned from the enthusiastic tribute paid to him by the great audience, and tenderly clasped the hands of the fragile gray figure at whose feet he laid every victory of his life.

The long parting came only a few days later; that parting which is now at an end. The years of waiting have been quiet years, spent by the bereaved widow within the shelter of her old home, and filled with many kindly deeds. And now—

The night is gone
And with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which she has loved long since, and lost awhile.

President Roosevelt attended the funeral services of Mrs. McKinley, being accompanied to Canton by several members of his Cabinet. in New York, gather your moneys and we will at your disposal ships to carry the food." Never Ambassadors in tinsel livery so bind the hearts oreigners to us as did those ships loaded with stuffs for the hungry. And now the great China e is on us. Not only THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but he great Red Cross Society, with Secretary Taft head, is sending hundreds of thousands of dollars arving China. "Bread! Bread!" is the cry from the seas. "Bread, Bread! Bread from America." to-day China is awakening to the fact that the of the Caucasian loves China and is ready to mething better than steal its land.

Benediction of the "Buford" ave witnessed many great scenes in my life, but I expect again to witness a scene as overwhelming at which I saw on April 30, 1907, on Pier 12 of San Francisco. Invited by telegraph to go to Francisco and superintend the services upon the f at the sailing of the Buford, filled with flour for famine sufferers of China, there was nothing for o do but telegraph, "Yes, I will go." I went. e amid the ruins of San Francisco, still seen on side, I started in to prepare for that meeting. visit there was a scene of continual surprises. In first place, instead of finding one boat filled with ne flour, I found that the United States Govern- had placed at the services of THE CHRISTIAN ALD Relief Fund two great army transports, the ord and the Logan. There they were as two white- ed angels of mercy, flanking the wharf at the same . Then, as soon as I mentioned that charmed word, ine flour" for China, the army men placed at my osal the wharf for religious service, which was con- y to every military regulation. Then I found that were willing to detail me a military band for my ice. Then I went to the highest and most influen- man in the northern part of our State, Benjamin Wheeler, president of California University, and , "Will you come and help us bless the cargo for ering China?" And at once he answered, "I will e." Then I telephoned to Sacramento to James ett, the Governor of the State, and said, "Will you e?" And he said, "I'll come." Then I went to the ling Episcopalian bishop of the West, Dr Nichols, said, "Will you come?" And he said, "I'll come." n I asked the most important layman of the Cath- church in California, one of the cleanest statesmen ever occupied a mayoralty chair in any city of the , and as noble and pure a Christian as ever lived— I asked Mayor Phelan, "Will you speak?" and he , "I'll speak." And there we assembled upon the wharf on April 30, Protestant and Catholic, educator and pulpiteer, statesman and Salvation Army leader. We sang the old Gospel songs, and we prayed and read out of the old Sacred Book, and we besought a blessing on the two great ships, the Buford and the Logan, as they started on their mission of international love.

I have been receiving for months protests against the military and naval pageants which were advertised for the Jamestown Exhibition of 1907. I do not say whether those symbols of war are, or are not, out of place. But I say now that while army and navy officers are going to Jamestown to extend to each other international courtesies, no class of people has been more earnest and helpful in sending forth the famine bread to China than the American army officers and the American navy officers. God bless them for the part they have taken in sending forth the international messengers of peace, the Buford and the Logan, filled with food for famine-struck, agonizing China.

The Future of China

We talk about China, ignorant, superstitious China. But China is soon to become one of the powerful, dominating forces of the world. In the first place, the Chinese brain is one of the keenest of all brains. The memorizing power of the Chinese is simply infinite. Some of their leading men are walking encyclopedias of oriental lore, and whole libraries of books they have committed verbatim. Then their investigating ability, when trained aright, will be second to that of no people upon the face of the globe. Did you ever reflect on the fact that the Chinese have understood the art of manufacturing glass over 2,000 years? They also have been manufacturers of gunpowder so long that history cannot find out when they first invented it. They practised the art of printing a thousand years before it was invented by Gutenberg. They knew all the laws pertaining to the mariner's compass a thousand years ago. Then, not only is the Chinese brain of the finest caliber, but the Chinamen also have marvelous stick-ativeness and industry. The Chinaman is proverbially honest. Is he not affectionate? Why, the most faithful and loving servant on earth is the Chinaman. Is he not brave? There is no class of men upon the face of the earth more brave than he. The Christian Chinamen in the late Boxer uprising proved this, when they were willing to lay down their lives to protect the Christian missionaries.

Then, take the land of China. Not only are its inhabitants as multitudinous as the sands of the sea, but its land is among the richest upon the face of the globe. Theirs is a land and a people which the missionary movements will develop and recreate. China, the downtrodden and the superstitious, will soon become China the mighty, and one of the greatest peace developers and peace protectors of the world. Thus, alongside of justice, and humanitarianism, I place the great divine touch, the Gospel missionary and the educational movements which shall uplift the heathen nations and fit them to be our associates and colleagues in the building of the "Great White Temple of Perpetual Peace." These are the three great basic movements which are to clasp all nations together in the golden bands of a universal brotherhood.

Christ's Approval

And now, what is the practical application? It is this: There is one duty above all others which is now prompting us to help forward this Universal Peace movement. I have told you how hundreds of thousands of dollars have already been raised for the suffering Chinese. I have told you how the two great army transports, the Buford and the Logan, have gone on their international peace mission, carrying food to that dying people. I have told you how thousands upon thousands of dollars have been cabled to provide breadstuffs in the famine camps, at a time when one thousand, ay, ten thousand, ay, one million, ay, fifteen million men and women and children were starving in China. The good news has come that the worst distress is over, and that, thanks to the generosity of the Christian world, there is no longer need of aid. But you, as an American, as a lover of international peace, as a Christian and as a disciple of Jesus, did all you could for their help while the need existed. Jesus was looking at you while you gave. He was watching your full wardrobe, your full pocketbook and your full cupboard. He was saying to you, "Wilt thou give to my starving ones? Thy hungry neighbors to-day have a yellow skin, and are living on China's shore. Wilt thou feed me? Wilt thou clothe me? Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these ye did it unto me."

God bless the President of the United States who has joined in calling the coming Peace Conference at the Hague. God bless Theodore Roosevelt, the Christian layman who has gone down deep into his own pocketbook to feed hungry China! God bless all men and women, Catholic and Protestant alike, who have worked to save the starving, dying Chinese! And God bless all who have aided in this humanitarian enterprise, for they have not only worked for Jesus, but for a universal brotherhood. They have helped forward the day when the great white Temple of Perpetual Peace shall be builded in this world, as well as lifted among the white mansions of the celestial capitol of Heaven.

FOUNDED AND BUILT BY PRAYER

The Strange Story of the Bible Institute in Pittsburg and Its Gospel Work

The Wylie Avenue Church

THAT faith in God will accomplish things which to man may seem impossible has received remarkable demonstration in the history of the Bible Institute of Pittsburg, Pa. It is an organization whose Christian activities are sustained entirely through prayer, one of the very few cases of the kind in the United States at the present time.

The history of this singular work, now in its sixth year, is a most interesting one. With absolutely no endowment or permanent fund; with neither collections nor salaries, and without even telling of the needs of the work either in public or private, this Institute, with its forty students, has been acquired and equipped throughout, until now it represents $250,000 worth of property held in trust. To make the matter seemingly still more inexplicable, it may be stated that no charge for tuition is made. How then has all this been accomplished? Simply by earnest prayer and simple trust in God.

The story of the work is best told, perhaps, in the words of the pastor and founder, the Rev. Charles H. Pridgeon, formerly of the First Presbyterian Church, Canonsburg, Pa. He says: "For eight years before the work was started there had been prayer and waiting on God for a work of faith and the way to be opened. On July 24, 1901, my wife and I spent the night in special prayer. We asked the Lord to guide us as to beginning a Bible Institute. Next morning, a telegram came which led to a conference and the offering of a building, to be used as church and Institute. We resigned from the church where we had spent almost twelve years of delightful service, in obedience to this call."

On the 8th day of December, 1901, the Pittsburg Bible Institute, undenominational, sustained by faith and free to all, was founded and opened. Its object is to afford an opportunity to those who may desire to gain a thorough and practical knowledge of the Word of God and of methods of Christian work; to train those who desire to enter the ministry or to become evangelists; to prepare missionaries for city, home or foreign fields; to instruct Bible teachers and Christian workers; to enable theological students to devote themselves for a season exclusively to the study of the English Bible and to the winning of souls; to prepare students to read both the Old and New Testaments in the original languages, and to train in prayer and for all Christian service.

Practical work is the chief feature. Besides lectures and studies, there is regular outside work in missions, hospitals, house-to-house visitation, cottage meetings, evangelistic and after-meetings, and open-air and tent meetings, according to season and opportunity. This practical work is part of the course. Students have frequent opportunities to do public work; but the spiritual life is counted paramount and prominence is given to prayer as the special need of this present day.

There are now between thirty and forty students, about equally divided in the matter of sex. They may enter at any time, as the Institute is open all the year round. The prescribed course covers two, three or four years, as the student elects.

The home for students is in close proximity to the church and the Institute, and contains ample accommodations. Single rooms are the rule. The boarding question is solved by the co-operative system, such as is in vogue in many colleges, each student paying only for what he actually consumes. All expenses are not allowed to exceed three dollars a week per head. As a matter of fact they have been usually considerably less. Most of the work of the Home is done by the students themselves. Employment is secured for students for part of the day, by which means they are enabled to work their way through the Institute while in training. No would-be student is ever turned away from the doors of the Institute, even though he be penniless.

A Meeting in One of the Mission Halls of the Institute

Among the unique features of this work is day prayer, or "Lord's Watch," in the church student takes turns with the pastor and his praying for half an hour, both in behalf of pers send requests for aid through such prayer, and needs of the work itself. Thousands of people denominations have been prayed for, and acco the answers received from them, kept on file Institute. By far the majority of such prayers ha happily answered. Every month scores o answers are printed in the Record of Faith, a zine published by the Institute and circulate Blank forms to be filled out by the person wi prayer to be offered up for himself or others, a to any one desiring them. No names are eve lished. Hundreds of answers to prayer are r every month.

The fine printing press and outfit for publishi tained by the Institute was a response to Prayers were offered that a press might be provi it was found that the cost of having the printing outside was too great. Shortly afterward, a Pittsburg printer called and offered his old which originally cost $20,000, and this was ac It was in good working order, and is still doing s Other gifts came in the same manner—organs, money, contributions, clothes, and a host of artic numerous to mention.

Open-air meetings are held every night by the tute workers on the steps of the court-house on Street and at the corner of Market and Water S Big crowds gather to listen to the sweet music, a hear the impassioned exhortations. Besides these town services, public meetings are held in the Avenue Church. Census of the attendance one showed seventeen denominations, including Heb Catholics and Spiritualists.

Rev. Charles H. Pridgeon, foun the Institute, is a graduate of P ton. He was a student of theol the old Edinburgh Seminary, which he pursued a course in many. He is a preacher and te of wide experience and has occ several important charges. His is a woman of magnetic perso and intense earnestness in missi effort. She is known as a succ writer, singer and composer of s music. She spent nine years mission worker in New York a the Italians of the East Side. has the same unfaltering fait prayer that characterizes her band.

The results of the labor these two consecrated workers now apparent to all. They have consciousness that their labors been divinely acknowledged and their efforts are increasingly bl as the years pass by.

AMONG THE MOUNTAIN WHITES

PRESIDENT E. O. GUERRANT of the Society of Soul-Winners has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the ninth official report of the Society, covering its operations during the last twelve months. It is a story replete with spiritual interest and inspiration. The Society has now sent forth more than 100 workers and sustained them without a dollar of debt. Nine years ago it began with one missionary and $360. God has multiplied the number to 103 missionaries and the gifts to over $15,000, without a single collection from any church. Treasurer Bullock reports that he has received during the past year $16,150.92, and paid out $13,249.61. Besides this, the following sums were received for building and maintaining schools, colleges, churches, etc.: The Log College, $5,500; the Andrews Chapel and Cottage, $200; the Smoky Mountain Seminary, $155.53; making a total of over $22,000.

The money to accomplish this work has been voluntarily contributed by individual Christians all over the world. These hundred mission teachers and preachers have only received bare living expenses. Their time and labor they have freely given to God and his poor children. Most of them have received only $10 a month. Nearly all have labored in the "regions beyond" churches and preachers, among the forgotten people in the mountains of North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky. During the year they have made 9,917 pastoral visits; held 4,563 public services; received 1,193 confessions; they had 173 preaching points; 162 Sunday Schools, with 7,048 pupils and 346 teachers. They distributed 380 Bibles and Testaments and 33,387 tracts; sold 253 colportage books and 378 song books, and collected $112.74 for expenses of schools. They taught 37 day schools, with 1,711 pu During the year the Society has built 10 new chapels schoolhouses. One woman gave $6,000 for the orph home, and three men have provided for two more edi for church and school, to be built this summer. The College, twenty-five miles from a railroad, has enro 210 students (45 more than last year). Six years ago Society began this school under an old, ragged t During the fall and winter, the Society sent over 75 b and barrels of clothing to the poor mountaineers in States; the gifts of generous individuals and ladies' so ties all over the United States.

The Beginning of a Mountain School

In this vast mountain empire of 4,000,000 peo descendants of Anglo-Saxon ancestors, there are yet of thousands of people without the Gospel, or the m of getting it. For more than 100 years they have b passed by and left to perish. There are no finer pe anywhere. These are the people the Society is strivin help. The headquarters of the Society are at Wilmore,

A MIGHTY WORK OF GRACE

Frederick Wood Tells of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Orphan Work in Far-off India

ONG recent arrivals in New York are the Rev. and Mrs. Frederick Wood, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, Bombay, India, and secretary and treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN India Famine Orphan Fund.

nd Mrs. Wood first went to India in 1888, where ve since labored, except for a six months' vaca- 1900. They have now returned on furlough on of health. Their four children, all born in , accompany them. The oldest children will here to complete their education.

Wood's work in India has been varied, he having ens English pastor, missionary to European and seamen, and missionary in charge of native work. this service Mrs. Wood has been a true and helpmeet, and a most efficient missionary. For ten years they have labored in Bombay. God ed their labors among the seamen, hundreds of rofessed conversion in their meetings. The as entirely self-supporting, and a heavy debt ed off. For the past seven years they have had of the Gujarati congregation. They have also oversight of Marathi and Hindustani churches. ave seen their Gujarati church grow and develop ncouraging manner; over two hundred converts he non-Christian faiths (Hindu, Mohammedan rsee, as well as Jewish), have confessed Christ in . They have had a great battle with the plague, ortality from this disease in Bombay city alone ing tens of thousands. During these years 150 of their Christians have died from plague olera.

r great aim is to make the Indian church self- ting. This church is already organized with a ly conference and official board; with several eetings, Sunday Schools, and day and night in various parts of the city; and also six or different preaching places. In one locality, they have a large number of Christians, they are xious to build a simple church building, which also be used for institutional purposes. The cost ting a building suitable for present requirements be about $2,000, and the land would cost another . In the matter of self-support, this native has increased from $15 a year to $150; while an friends in the city help to an almost equal t.

Wood is intensely interested in the production of stian literature for the increasing Christian com- and an ever-increasing staff of Indian workers r field, realizing the value of such literature in velopment of Christian character. In addition regular duties as a missionary, he has for some been secretary and treasurer of the Bombay dist Publishing House. He has been connected nd held office in the several local undenomina- and inter-denominational societies, having been ary of the Tract Society and president of the ay Missionary Conference. He is also the secre- f the Bombay Annual and Marathi District Con- es of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

But to readers of this journal he will be best known as the secretary and treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Famine Orphan Support Fund for the past three years, during which time hundreds of thousands of dollars have passed through his hands for the support of famine orphans. Speaking of the orphan work, he said:

"Think of the thousands of young lives rescued from surroundings and environments saturated in superstition, degradation and spiritual darkness! Think of the tremendous influence upon and object-lesson set before non-Christian India of this wonderful exhibition of Christian charity! In more than one place have I seen this influence manifested in the changed attitude of the community toward the missionaries and the preaching of the Gospel. In caste-ridden India this practical exhibition of the Christian doctrine of the 'fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man' made a truly wonderful impression, the fruits of which will doubtless be seen in many ways in the future, and it has undoubtedly already influenced many in accepting Christ. In all the history of the Christian Church since apostolic times, has ever such a herculean and Christlike task as this been attempted and so successfully carried on?

"The number of orphans in the orphanages naturally is continually decreasing," he continued. "Some of the children have died; some have gone out to earn their own living, and numbers of the girls, having reached a marriageable age, have gone out to establish Christian homes, becoming the wives of mission workers, teachers and others. Still the number in the orphanages is considerable, and they keep the hands of the missionaries full, and tax their thought and energies to the utmost in their maintenance and training. I have visited a number of orphanages and can speak unreservedly of the good work being done in the schools and workshops, and of the spiritual, physical and intellectual training the children are receiving. Most of the schools, workshops and industrial schools are also under government patronage and inspection, receiving financial aid according to the grade of the institution; and with perhaps few exceptions all have elicited from government inspectors, both English and Indian, sincere praise and approval. No one not acquainted with the difficulties and the strain of such a work can fully understand and appreciate the heroic service being rendered to those waifs, to India and to the Church by the men and women missionaries engaged in this great labor of love.

"There is not the slightest doubt that the orphan work will be a mighty factor in the regeneration of India, and a great and powerful lever in the spiritual uplifting of its millions, and in ushering in the reign of the Lord Jesus Christ. From these orphanages are coming the native Christian preachers, teachers and Bible women, doctors and nurses and artisans. The orphanage schools, industrial workshops and training schools will be needed a little longer; and some of the orphans—those who are intended for a professional course—will need assistance and support for some years yet. And as these young people go forth into the world as Christian men and women, establishing Christian homes and raising a growing Christian community, their influence will be beyond computation. In this THE CHRISTIAN HERALD orphan work has been of untold value.

"The spiritual results cannot be over-estimated. This is important. If the work failed in spiritual results, and as an evangelizing agency, all else would count for very little. The essential consideration is the real work of grace that has been wrought in the hearts of many of these children. Large numbers have been converted. At present, there is a real and gracious revival going on in some of the orphanages. Indeed, experienced missionaries declare that a more genuine work of grace has not been witnessed in any land. Doubtless this has been in answer to the prayers of many of God's people. The future is bright. God is working out his own designs for India's redemption; and privileged indeed are those who in any degree are taking their share in this blessed work."

That which Mr. Wood has prized most has been the numerous letters received from missionaries of all denominations (and the message of which he would pass on to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers), couched in language expressing the heartiest appreciation of, and most heartfelt gratitude for, the great and Christlike work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, in the rescue and support of these thousands of orphans during all these years.

CHINA WELCOMES OUR RELIEF SHIP

TER a favorable passage, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief ship Buford reached the port of hai, May 30. Mr. E. R. Johnstone, our repre- tive on the transport, sent the following cable mes- hortly after her arrival at Chinkiang, whither she eded direct from Shanghai:

"Chinkiang, May 30.

rrived this morning and now unloading, under im- ate direction of Missionary Committee. Chinese of- s co-operating cordially in food distribution. Cargo distributed as follows: Kiangsi province, 25,000 of flour; Huian, 20,000 sacks; Antung, 10,000 ; Tsingkiangpu, 25,000 sacks; Yaowan also in- d in distribution. Famine fever spreading rapidly. hs unnumbered, reaching enormous total. Full tics probably never be known. New crop aver- poor. Few potatoes have been planted. Farmers no seed.

am going to visit famine area immediately.

(Signed) "JOHNSTONE."

the same day the following was received by cable the editor of the North China Herald, at Shanghai: Buford has arrived at Chinkiang and now rapidly ading. Chinese officials are furnishing boats and co-operating heartily. Entire cargo will be distributed in four great famine centres, where it is most urgently needed. Conditions are still bad in many districts."

News of the Buford's safe arrival will be welcomed by many thousands of readers of this journal, who have had a personal share in the China relief work. With the unloading of the Buford's cargo, and that of the Logan (which is probably in Chinkiang now), and when the work of distributing the flour at the relief depots along the Grand Canal and in the interior is fairly under way, the great Chinese famine of 1907 will be at an end. Such is the official announcement made by the authorities at Shanghai, and it must gladden the hearts of all who by contributing toward the food cargoes have assisted in bringing about this happy result. First in the famine field with foreign aid, the generous people of America have now the gratification of knowing that their crowning gift through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—the two shiploads of life-giving food—has been the means of driving back the hosts of famine all along the line.

That this has been accomplished is made clear in a cable message from Shanghai, which says that in view of the liberal American gifts and especially of the two food cargoes, the official relief committee has decided that no further help will be necessary. These magnificent gifts have already relieved the worst distress. There are a few remote districts, it is added, where the suffering will continue for a protracted period; but the suffering in those sections will receive continued assistance through the committees, and they will be supplied with flour in sufficient quantities to meet their needs until a harvest is reaped. In those districts, there is at present no sign of a harvest, the crop failure being almost a total one.

At the international bazar held in Shanghai in aid of the famine fund, the sum of $60,000 was realized, which was handed to the Committee, to be expended in the relief work. This bazar was the first occasion on which there was active co-operation between the Chinese and foreigners of all nationalities, and it is regarded as a significant indication of the improved relations.

Mr. Johnstone's letters, which may shortly be expected, will give full details of the food destitution. He will also relate the results of his tour of the famine area, and will tell us, from personal observation, what the actual conditions are at the present time, and to what extent America's splendid charity contributed toward the success of the long fight against famine.

Healing in the Church

NEW theories of healing, which are really as old as civilization, were explained to the Johns Hopkins Medical Society recently by the rector of a Protestant Episcopal church in Boston, Mass. The theories, the clergyman said, are put in practice in his church with marvelous results. The system is not Christian Science, nor is it altogether hypnotism, nor is it strictly faith healing, though it has suggestions of all three. The fact that physicians are in attendance to diagnose and advise indicates the difference between it and the systems mentioned. Besides this, no organic diseases are treated, but only patients whose organs are normally healthy but are not performing their functions. The movement began in November last, and so successful has it been that hundreds of people from all sections of the country are now seeking its help.

"We base our work," said the clergyman, "on a combination of two principles—first, the religion of Christ as recorded in the New Testament and substantiated by modern scholarship, and second, the use of the best scientific help we can command." The object is to get the patient cured, and this can often be done by removing the mental, moral, or spiritual causes that have combined to make him ill. The clergyman and his friends have found, as every physician knows, that there is a close connection between the mind and the body, and that the disordered mind often produces a disordered condition of the body. The nervous sufferer does not receive from his family and friends the sympathy he is entitled to, for his suffering is very real, if it is, as they say, "only the nerves." The physician administers his medicines, but he is often conscious that he is prescribing for the symptom, not for the disease. Or he recommends rest, and if the patient obeys he goes into retirement, where he has more time and opportunity to dwell on his worries, and comes back worse than when he went away. This is not a case for the physician, and it is not always a case for the clergyman; but the clergyman's province is sometimes nearer the trouble than is the physician's.

The true healer of such sufferers is, as the Boston clergyman, the Christian Scientist and the faith healer have all discovered, the man who can, as Shakespeare says, "minister to a mind diseased." The shock of some dread news which kills a man, as surely as if he were struck by a club, has many gradations. The mental distress which does not kill, may, in some subtle way, affect the vital organs, producing sluggishness or some other disorder, and the cure of the disorder may come through relief of that distress. If the patient can be brought to take a different view of his trouble; to realize that all things work together for good to them that love God; to accept the affliction as discipline; to place implicit faith in the love of God who has given him that cup to drink; or to place his case in the hands of his Saviour, who bore the sicknesses as well as the sins of his people—in any of these states of mind, he is relieved, ceases to fret and worry, and is at rest in Christ. The effect is a mental and spiritual peace that passes understanding, and it affects the body which the lack of it had disturbed. This method of treating a sufferer is not fanatical but logical. The faith healer declares that it is Christ healing in answer to prayer, and that is true, for he is the source of all spiritual health. The other healers may say that it is a subjective process resulting from clearer ideas of God's providence, and that, too, is true, for the change of mind is Christ's work. The patient cured, the healer rejoices and says, "Not unto us, but unto thy name, be all the glory."

Some Facts About Child Labor

WE have received recently a number of letters comparing the figures we have given with reference to the child labor problem with those which were given by the latest United States Census Report. One of our correspondents asks if our "startling assertions are based upon an aggravated case of national hysteria which has grown out of baseless press fabrications." We are glad of an opportunity to answer these questions, basing our statements upon figures for the authenticity of which we can vouch.

After repeated requests from the National Child Labor Committee, the Census Bureau has issued a circular entitled Child Labor in the United States, based upon hitherto unpublished information derived from the schedules of the twelfth census (1900). This bulletin states that of the 1,750,178 children under fifteen years of age who are breadwinners, no less than 688,207 are employed in "other than agricultural pursuits"—i. e., in the mines, the factories, the canning establishments, the streets and the sweatshops of our country. Of these 186,358 were avowedly under thirteen years old, and according to the government inspectors' reports, were engaged in those occupations the character of which is most open to the objections urged.

These figures are compiled from the reports of government inspectors, who, it should be remembered, must make their computations from necessarily inadequate research. Using the Pennsylvania coal-breakers as an example, it is true that 75 per cent. of the boys employed were born in foreign lands. The affidavits of their parents are all that can be obtained to verify their ages, and these are absolutely unreliable. The mine inspectors and school superintendents report very different figures, and their conservative estimate is that in the coal-breaker region there are 14,760 boys working under age with falsified certificates.

Again, the Bureau of Statistics and Information of Maryland reports that it has issued "twice as many permits for children as were reported by the manufacturers in 1905." There has been an increase of 55 per cent. in the number of spindles in Southern mills since 1900, and Mr. R. M. Miller, Jr., one time president of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, states that "75 per cent. of the spinners in North Carolina cotton mills are fourteen years old and under."

Speaking generally, we believe that discussion develops the real facts of child slavery, and as such we welcome it. It is only necessary that the facts shall be carefully investigated and published broadcast for the people to determine that our national industries shall not be built upon a basis of child labor, and that compulsory education laws must be enacted in every State.

Strong Words from the Bench

THERE are many good people who are generously tolerant on the liquor question. They stand up sturdily for what they are pleased to call the "freedom of the individual," and they resent, on this ground, any movement that would check the spread of intemperance by curbing the saloons. Temperate themselves, they do not realize the fact that there are multitudes of human beings who are so constituted that drink is to them an irresistible temptation and a quick road to ruin.

To these moderate drinkers and advocates of individual freedom we commend the remarks of a metropolitan magistrate, Charles S. Whitman, who spoke before the Lawyers' Club recently. Mr. Whitman is president of the Board of Magistrates for Manhattan and the Bronx, and is thoroughly familiar with the various aspects of the temperance question in New York. Defining his attitude on the enforcement of the excise laws, he said:

Personally, if I had the power, I would close every saloon in the United States, and I am not a crank or a fanatic on the liquor question. I drink myself, whenever I care to, and probably shall continue to do so. I am willing that every other man shall have the same rights that I have. But when you sit on the bench that I sit on and see seventy per cent. of the cases that come before you, and see the misery, distress and crime, all due to liquor selling, I say any man with red blood in his veins is likely to feel that the world would be infinitely better off if the liquor saloons could be crushed out, cost what it may. I believe it is the most abominable, the most outrageous, and the most inhuman influence in New York City to-day.

This is strong language from a metropolitan magistrate, but its truth is unquestionable. We venture to assert that the same ratio of seventy per cent. of all police cases due to drink, which Magistrate Whitman finds in the city of New York, prevails in other cities, and to a large extent throughout the country generally. It has been estimated by careful observers that nearly two-thirds of all the crimes that come before our courts of justice are the result of drink; that it claims the lives of 100,000 victims in this country annually; and that a large proportion of the expenditures for criminal trials, construction and maintenance of jails and court-houses, and salaries of judiciary and police, are directly due to the traffic which this outspoken magistrate denounces as "the most abominable, outrageous, and inhuman influence in New York to-day."

Education and the Gospel are slowly enlightening the people of our land regarding the tremendous power for evil which the drink traffic wields. The time will come when every intelligent citizen will oppose this vice of all vices, which destroys more human beings than all other crimes together, which wrecks more homes and produces more misery and suffering than all other agencies, and which oppresses society with the heaviest burdens it has to bear.

The President and the Boys

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT made a speech a while ago to the boys of the Friends' School in ington, in which his son Archie is a pupil. The dent likes to give good advice to boys, and on s occasions he has shown them what sort of boys should be, if in future they are to be desirable ci of the great Republic. The President's advice is able, not merely because he is Chief Executive, b cause he is an all-round American, honored at hom abroad.

Addressing the boys, Mr. Roosevelt told them in stance that the lad who shirked his school work never make a worthy member of society in later He said that it was a boy's duty to work hard wh worked, and play hard when he played. He liked boys whole-hearted and strenuous in whatever they doing, whether it were work or play. He did not li see them able-bodied on the play-ground, and sud feeble if their mothers asked them to run upstairs an errand. In conclusion, he glanced with keen e the young football eleven in the front seats—an e of which his son Archie is an enthusiastic member- said, "I am going to give you three rules that I gr like myself: 'Don't flinch, don't foul, and hit the hard.'"

The President's advice to the boys is good advic the rest of us. To play the game fairly, never to fl never to take a mean advantage, always to do our would it not transform the world if we all acted on principle, and lived up to that standard!

A Talk with General Kuroki

A NEW YORK Herald reporter put to the distinguished anese soldier this question:

"There are people in this country who believe that yo making preparations to take the Philippines, and that some before many years you will send a fleet down there and seiz islands. Has such a suggestion reached you during your here?"

General Kuroki smiled and exchanged a few words quickly Captain Tanaka.

"The General says," replied Captain Tanaka, "that he has heard that any one thought such a thing. He says that if make war on us, we will run away from you."

"Conditions are very settled all through the East," conti General Kuroki, "and I do not look for further disturbances t In China everything is progressing, and I do not think there be any difficulties there of any kind. All through the East ditions are very good I do not expect there will be any tro over anything between Japan and America. They are frie They will remain friends. We want to be America's friend we want America to be our friend."

"Did the San Francisco incident cause alarm in Japan?"

"Everybody in Japan knew all about that matter. We all k that it was purely a local affair which could not involve the nations in a dispute. We were not worried over it at all."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

An African Trial

the course of a graphic lecture describing his recent ourney across Africa, Lieutenant Boyd Alexander gave a thrilling description of an incident which oc- nd in northern Nigeria. The wages of the bearers paid as usual in cloth, which in that and other sec- of Africa is the native money or recognized medium change. During the journey Lieutenant Alexander ted that there was discontent among the bearers, h reached a crisis when the caravan came to Nigeria. as practically alone, for on the way death robbed of his brother Claude Alexander and his comrade tin Gosling, who started with him, and he had lost help of his chief assistant Mr. Talbot, who was ed to return home. He was therefore at the mercy s native carriers and was concerned about their dis- nt. He questioned them as well as as able about their grievances and l that the chief was that their cloth being stolen. They suspected one of own number of being the thief. tenant Alexander endeavored to get he basis of their evidence, but the had no confidence in such methods. wanted the suspected man to be hrough the ordeal customary among in such cases. As the camp was nfusion owing to the trouble, and thing resembling a strike was immi- , Lieutenant Alexander yielded. men took the matter into their own s. They sent for two witch doctors Maifoni, before whom the complaint laid. They seated themselves face ce on the ground, supporting be- n their breasts a slender wand. The le camp gathered around the men, rly watching the proceeding. Every was intent on the wand, and every full of awe at the great men whose d powers were being exercised. e suspected man was placed at their facing the wand. Presently it was rved that the wand began to bend ard towards him, indicating his t. This could be easily managed by witch doctors, who could control by r breathing the movements of the d. The suspected man saw at once the decision was against him, though as supposed by all the natives that wand had been bent by supernatural ncy. His confession of guilt fol- ed, and confirmed the natives in their ef in the efficacy of the method of l. Lieutenant Alexander took a tograph of the proceedings at the ical moment, which he took home exhibited as a characteristic me- to of native African criminal inves- tion. We smile at such a method of l, which is obviously unfair to the used, but our own methods are by no ns infallible. The wrongdoers among know that justice does not always ke the guilty, and that fact often en- rages them to continue in sin, forget- g that at the last they must stand ore a Judge who is omniscient.

The Trial by Ordeal of a Suspected Thief in Nigeria, Central Africa

Queen's Mask

Among the new discoveries made in Egypt by Mr. eodore M. Davis, the famous American archeologist, n alabaster mould of the head of Queen Tele. The uld is perfect and shows a face of remarkable beauty, y firm and masterful. The nose is delicate and its -aquiline curve indicates some other race than Egypt- n. It is all alabaster except the eyes and eyebrows, ich are represented by inlays of lapis lazuli and obsid- n. The suspicion that the queen was of foreign origin borne out by history. Though her husband, Amen- tep, was exceedingly proud of her, and caused many rabs carved in stone to be made as memorials of the rriage, there is a significant omission in the inscrip- n. Uusually in such records the parentage and pedi- ee of the royal lady have a conspicuous place, but in is instance she is simply stated to be "queen-consort, e wife of the mighty king," etc., as if to remind any o might reflect on her humble origin, of the exalted station to which she had been raised. It is in this fashion that the Church, the bride of Christ, is honored, not for herself, but because she is her Lord's.

Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might present it to himself a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing. (Eph. 5: 25, 27.)

A Timid Pedestrian

The story of a man who was badly scared a few nights ago is told by a Philadelphia journal. He was later than usual in getting home from the city, and he felt a little timid in starting on his lonely road from the railroad station to his home. He grew still more uncomfortable as he heard footsteps behind him, and began to recall stories of highwaymen, garroters, etc. He quickened his pace, but his tracker did likewise. Then he took a roundabout path, but his tracker followed. At last he turned into a churchyard, thinking, "Now, if he follows me here I shall know he is following on purpose." The man did follow, and when he was sternly asked, "What do you mean by following me at this hour of the night?" gave a simple reply: "Excuse me, sir," he said, "but do you always go home in this peculiar way? I am going to Mr. Brown's, and the porter at the station told me that I would be right if I followed you, for you lived next door." The explanation was satisfactory, and the two men went forward together. The timid traveler had some excuse for his alarm. He was concerned about his own safety; perhaps if the Christian realized how often some child or grown man is following him in his moral and spiritual path, he too would be concerned for the other's safety.

Be thou an example of the believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity. (I. Tim. 4 : 12.)

Unknown Treasures

A French newspaper reports the discovery of a priceless work of art. It appears that a picture dealer in the Rue St. Lazare in Paris required recently a frame of unusual proportions. He was in a hurry for it and the carpenter to whom he applied was unable to make it that day, but at night he came around to the dealer's, carrying a framed picture which he had picked up in a furniture shop. The frame was the exact size required and the carpenter offered it and the picture for four dollars. The picture dealer gladly bought it and the frame was quickly transferred. The canvas that had been in the frame was tossed aside as worthless, but the next day the dealer examined it and found it to be a variant of Raphael, worth at least sixteen thousand dollars. A similar incident has occurred in Birmingham, England. A physician, who was gratuitously treating a poor patient, saw on the wall of his lodging a picture covered with dirt and cobwebs. He thought that it might suit his own room if it was cleaned. The landlady was appealed to and willingly sold it for three dollars. The restorer, to whom the physician sent it, called upon him a few days later in great excitement, asking him if he knew that the painting was one of Sir Peter Lely's works and worth a large sum. Such instances are rare, but there is one treasure that is now offered freely, but often despised, that will prove at last to be of infinite worth.

Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes. (Luke 10: 21.)

Death of a Rescuer

A pathetic incident is reported from Dallas, Ga. It is that of the death of a boy of fourteen in rescuing his little brother. The boy, accompanied by his mother and brother, was walking along the Southern Railroad track when a train was heard. Seeing his brother some distance back on the trestle, he ran to him and made an effort to carry him off the trestle, but not having time to do so he pitched the little fellow to safety and was himself crushed to death by the train. The little one was found afterwards unhurt save for bruises from his fall. We all admire the heroism of the boy, but how few of us realize that our eternal life was won for us at such a price.

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

Cliff-Dwellers' Romance

A heretofore unknown collection of cliff-dwellers' homes has been found just west of the La Plata River, which furnishes a clue to the mystery of the disappearance of some of the tribes, a mystery that has long puzzled explorers. This newly discovered village consists of about fifty houses perched on rock shelves which extend at intervals to a height of five hundred feet above the bed of the canyon. Seen from below they look like swallows' nests and many of them could not be reached. In a valley five miles further along, isolated ruins were found. Excavations made disclosed mummies, stone ornaments, bones and pottery. The ruins are more extensive than any previously discovered. About the centre of it is a signal and defense tower equipped with protective devices of an ingenious character. The most interesting find, however, is that of a wall covered with hieroglyphic writing. Careful photographs of these inscriptions have been taken, which have been submitted to Prof. F. K. Porter, of Boston, Mass. These, taken in connection with those on the rocks of Shawano, have been studied and Prof. Porter believes he has discovered a clue to the system of writing. It would appear, from the portions he has read, that the cliff-dwellers had a romance resembling Homer's siege of Troy. The inscriptions describe a war over a woman who was beloved by a man who was chief of three tribes. The story is told how he seized her and carried her away. A war ensued, in which vast numbers of warriors fell. One inscription says that the princess who caused the war was killed by being shot in the eye by a fine-pointed arrow. It is astonishing to come upon a romance of this kind among our early aborigines. It shows that human nature is alike the world over, with the same propensities and the same need for regeneration.

From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? (James 4 : 1.)

ON THE HOME VERANDA

By Margaret E. Sangster

Gentle Judgment

"HATEFUL, stiff thing! I think she's just horrid," said Cynthia, as she linked her arm in that of Mary Ellen, and started to go home after a long day's work in the department store. In front of them, walking by herself, and looking very pale and listless, was a girl who rather shunned companionship than accepted it. She appeared to have no friends among her fellow clerks; she came and went alone, and had given great offense by constantly refusing to eat her lunch in the room with the others. A pleasant room provided by the firm for the use of its employees was occupied by successive groups of friends at the noon-hour, the convenience of customers obliging the clerks to relieve each other.

Angie, the pale girl who measured ribbon and matched colors all day long for fastidious mothers buying hair ribbons, and school-girls who cared a great deal abont getting the exact shade they needed, never joined these groups. She brought her luncheon every morning done up in a neat package, and she rather ostentatiously displayed it as she took off her jacket and hat. The box was a trifle larger than any of the others in the part of the store where she worked, and the girls fancied that it contained some dainty or delicacy that she greedily ate alone, not wishing to share it with any one else. They had a fashion of sharing the contents of their boxes, and each took turn in making tea or cocoa, to which it was customary for the whole set to pay, the cost being only a few cents apiece for each girl. Angie never partook of the cocoa or tea, and never ate when any one else was present. She managed to steal into the room just before it was closed for the day, when the others had finished. It gradually became the custom to shun Angie, and there were days when nobody spoke to her, and except in the course of business she spoke to no one during the time between opening and closing the store.

One very hot day, as she was measuring lengths of pink ribbon for a pretty girl who was shopping with her mother, she suddenly grew faint, wavered and fell, melting out of sight behind the counter, as the pretty girl said, "just as if she had been a bit of snow." Snow could not have been whiter than Angie's cheeks that day. She was carried into the rest room, the windows were opened, and as the fainting fit was a long one, a doctor was sent for. As she revived, he said to one who stood by, "This poor girl is dying of slow starvation." She was sent to her home in a carriage, and one of the girls went with her. The fainting fit was the beginning of an illness, and Angie was taken from her home to a hospital ward. The girl who accompanied her home was aghast at the bareness of the rooms and at the poverty she saw in the tenement that sheltered Angie, her invalid mother and a little crippled brother. She made some inquiries of the neighbors before she went away, and was told that the girl's father was dead, and that the only earnings that supported the family were those of the daughter.

In leaving the store for her home on the day that she was taken ill Angie had left her lunch box behind her. A day or two after, one of the clerks, observing it, remarked to another that they might as well carry it home and leave it with Angie's mother. "Why not open it?" said the other. "Everything in it will be too stale for use, and we might fill it with something nice and send it to Angie."

It is surprising how quickly a misfortune that can be seen awakens compassion. The very girls who had stood aloof from Angie were now anxious to show her sympathy in her hour of trouble. The box was opened at the noon-hour, and instantly a chorus of amazement broke from the assembled group. In the box there was not a crumb of food of any kind, nor any vestige of luncheons past. It was filled with soft tissue paper, and nothing else. At a glance the girls understood why their companion had so steadily refused to join them, and what she had concealed under her mask of reserve. Those who had called her stiff and horrid were the first to express regret for their hardness of heart.

From that moment efforts were made in a delicate way to minister to Angie's people; friends were found for her, and by one step and another the condition of the family was alleviated. When Angie returned from the hospital to resume her work and take the place that the firm had kept open, she found herself in an atmosphere of tenderness, and she expanded like a flower as every one approached her with kindness. There was a Working Girl's Club to which many of the young women belonged, and Angie was drawn into it. Some fine sewing was found that the mother, although an invalid, could undertake, and medical aid was sent to the cripple in the old arm-chair.

This little incident is true. If it has a lesson for any of us, that lesson is to be found in the words of our Lord: "Judge not, that ye be not judged."

A Notable Southern Family Group

RARELY, indeed, does the opportunity come of presenting to our readers so representative a family, not only in point of numbers, but more especially in the aggregation of health and happiness possessed by the fourteen children of Dr. William Folk, of Georgetown, S. C. Dr. Folk is the United States quarantine officer of that port; with Mrs. Folk and ten of his fourteen children he makes his home in the picturesque, vine-embowered nest, a corner of which is visible in our photograph. Unfortunately, four members of the family are missing from the group; two of the elder daughters having gone from the parental roof-tree to make homes of their own, while two stalwart boys, true sons of their sturdy father, have gone out into the world to make their own places in it. The chain of family affection in Dr. Folk's home is unbroken; death has never entered its portals. Still in the early afternoon of life, these richly blessed parents may look forward to a truly patriarchal age.

Japan's Tribute to General Grant

N the last day of his stay in New York, Baron Takewo Ozawa, the distinguished Japanese statesman and member of the House of Peers, p: the afternoon visiting the tomb of General Grant tiverside Park. In the Baron's party were Mr. Naitow, another member of the House of Peers; 'essor Shouzabouro Kanazawa of the Imperial Uni- ty and School of Foreign Languages in Tokio; Mr. Mitake S. Togo, A.M., the Baron's secretary; Mr. , the representative in New York of the Bank of n, and several other gentlemen.

r. Klopsch, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, accompanied the Baron and his friends, communi- d with the Ford Motor Company in York, and that pany generously led at the service the distinguished gers three of their six-cylinder tour- cars, in which the was made from Hotel Normandie, ty-eighth Street Broadway to Rerside Park. It a perfect day, clear bracing, and the tors were delighted their ride.

n reaching the soleum, the Japan- uncovered and ap- ached the last rest- place of the great erican soldier with deepest reverence.

"This I regard as of the most im- tant events of my t to your country," marked Baron Ozawa to Dr. Klopsch on leaving the usoleum. "I recall with great pleasure my meeting h Gen. Grant during his visit to Japan in 1879. It was a dinner given by the Emperor. On that occasion, re were present many distinguished men, American l Japanese, and I was a junior among them; but I ve never forgotten what took place. Our Emperor d others conversed with Gen. Grant and the latter lied in a deliberate and thoughtful fashion—he was man of slow speech, but well-balanced mind. He d been in several of our largest cities and had had an portunity of forming opinions concerning our national gress and characteristics. I remember that some one had asked him what he regarded as Japan's great- est need.

"'Railways, to open up the country from north to south, and across, from east to west,' he replied gravely. Turning to His Majesty he added: 'You should bring the different sections of your people into closer contact. Railways will develop trade and afford an immense stimulus to national life. Railways are the modern means of spreading civilization and knitting a people more firmly together. In times of peace they bring prosperity, and in time of war they are invaluable for the rapid transportation of troops and supplies.'

"Then he pointed out the advantages that would follow the construction of lines of railway from Tokio to Osaka, and between other points of importance. At that time we had only two short lines of railway, neither more than thirty miles in length.

"There was, of course, much more to talk of; but what the great general had said of the best means for securing Japan's development took deep root in the minds of our statesmen, and found favor in the eyes of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor. When it began to assume the form of a national policy, it was opposed by some of the older statesmen, who believed we should not follow Western ideas. But we have always regarded America as our friend, and the leading men in our government, after due consideration, acknowledged the wisdom and value of Gen. Grant's advice. We acted upon it and built our railways, and they have been a factor in our prosperity. But greater than all else, our railway system has proved invaluable to us as a means of national defense. Thus you can understand why I, a Japanese, do honor to Gen. Grant, whom we rightly regard as having contributed very greatly, by his wise counsel twenty-eight years ago, to the present greatness, prosperity and happiness which our country now enjoys."

The old Baron, as he spoke, leaned forward in the luxuriously upholstered seat of the motor car and smiled, while Secretary Togo translated his sentiments into English.

All the visitors expressed their surprise and pleasure at the smooth and easy motion of the swift Ford machines, which glided along as though on air, their perfect mechanical balance and total lack of vibration making the trip an ideal one. Each machine held four passengers besides a chauffeur, and as the three swept down Fifth Avenue on their return, the foreign visitors attracted much attention. Occasionally the pace was slackened in order that the principal buildings might be pointed out to the interested strangers.

As they alighted, the Baron stepped nimbly from his motor, and waved his hand to the other members of his party. All broke out in hearty acknowledgment of their delightful trip.

"This last evening of my visit has been the pleasantest of all," said Baron Ozawa to Dr. Klopsch. "Not since I left Japan have I passed so many agreeable hours. And this ride—it is the best I ever had in any automobile, either here or elsewhere. I shall never forget my delightful experience in these beautiful American machines. There is nothing to which I can compare it—nothing that is so thoroughly satisfying."

The Baron and his party sailed next day to attend the Red Cross International Congress in London.

d best drilled in the world. The men are hardy and inured to fatigue, and most them have been at some time under fire. If war does come the first rush across e southern border of Mexico will be made by that corps of the cavalry known the Rurales. They are the most picturesque mounted men in the world, not ex- pting the dashing Bedouins of the rian deserts. They have been in e saddle since childhood, they shoot om horseback with accurate aim, d they can make a good charge, bre in hand, though their horses are mewhat light for "shock" tactics.

They have a most romantic history. the day of the famous Santa Anna, eneral Lagarde enlisted a troop o nchmen, who wore in battle the ather, brass studded and fringed ress of their calling. When the cause f Santa Anna went down, these oops, instead of disbanding, became ghwaymen. They spread terror from era Cruz to the fortifications of lexico City. They had regular head- uarters at Malinche, near Puebla, nd conducted their operations on the lan of Robin Hood, robbing the rich, nd sometimes helping the poor. ravelers who fell into their hands ere usually well treated, though in- ariably relieved of any valuables they ight have about them.

The novel scheme was conceived by me official of the government of turning these highwaymen into protectors instead of robbers of the public. Strange to relate, the plan was a great success. They proved fine Indian fighters and pursued evil-doers with a relentless hand. They now number about 4,000. Each man provides horse and uniform; the government supplies his weapons. His ranchero suit is heavy with silver buttons and silver lace. His saddle and bridle jingle with silver ornaments. In many cases the stirrups are of solid silver. War would find these horsemen streaming to the front with the greatest enthusiasm for a conflict where the numbers engaged would make real battles possible instead of isolated skirmishes. The infantry are not much to look at, but they can stand long marches, and would probably give a good account of themselves in a campaign. They dress much as the French foot soldier, except that the Mexican marches with the bare feet, the soles alone being protected by sandals.

Mexican Rurales Ready for a Campaign

The troops of Guatemala are very good specimens of the Central American soldiery. Their uniforms give them a much more military appearance than those of Mexico. They resemble the Germans with their close-fitting helmets. If they are enthusiastic in the cause of President Cabrera they are likely to fight hard before the Mexicans see the inside of Guatemala City.

At any rate, a Mexican invasion would strengthen the president's hand.

MONUMENTS OF FAITH'S VICTORIES

Sunday School Quarterly Review

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Portrait at Zoan of a Pharaoh with Lion Body

THE excavations of recent years have brought to light the "double" of Bible history. We have before explained the "double" as being half of a duplicate contract or other commercial paper, which was to be surrendered when the debt should be paid. Both copies being written side by side on one sheet are torn apart, not cut, as recalled in our word "indenture." The two pieces would have to be fitted together at the settlement to prove both were parts of the original. Then the creditor surrendered the "double" as a receipt for full payment. The ancient monuments corroborate Bible history as its "double." To-day's Review covers the lessons from Jacob's dream to the Passover.

Joseph Welcomes Jacob to Egypt

After Jacob had tarried at what was afterward called Bethel all night, and had seen the ladder or steps to heaven, he took the stone which had been his pillow and set it up as a pillar, and there he made a vow to serve God all his life, and to give one-tenth of his income to God. Pillars of this sort may be seen to-day in the region where Jacob was, and indeed in all parts of Palestine. By such memorials men not only strengthen their own faith, but give to others tangible proof of their trust in God. In life or death one may give testimony to God by a stone set up, even a grave-stone.

Jacob Overcome at Jabbok

The next lesson from Jacob's life was when he wrestled with God at the brook Jabbok, but knew not that it was God until he was overcome. How unwilling was he then to be left alone without God's blessing! And God did bless him and gave him a new name. We are not told that Jacob set up a pillar there, but he gave the place a name which was monumental: "Peniel," meaning, "I have seen God face to face." We are not unaccustomed to seeing memorial windows placed in churches in memory of dear ones, and on battlefields and in public squares in honor of those who have done great deeds. One of the noblest of monuments was a husband's monument in memory of his wife, who had been much devoted to missions. He said: "My memorial to her shall be my support of five medical missionaries."

During the quarter we have had four lessons in the life of Joseph: Sold into Egypt, Cast into Prison, Made Ruler of Egypt, His Wonderful Forgiveness of his Brothers. Excavations made in Egypt where Joseph lived have brought to light direct and indirect confirmations of the Bible story.

Joseph's brethren, in the remorse they showed in prison and when he revealed himself, vividly recalling their sin in selling him twenty-two years before, illustrate the relation of conscience to joy and sorrow, and the profound saying that "nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember." A poor Indian was asked one time what his conscience was. Putting his hand over his heart, he said, "It is a little three-cornered thing in here. When I do wrong, it turns around and hurts very much. If I keep on doing wrong, it will turn until it wears the edges all off, and then it will not hurt any more."

Joseph's Magnanimity

One of Joseph's greatest accomplishments as a ruler was the redeeming of his wicked brothers from their cruelty and selfishness to become not only loving and considerate sons to their father, but such men as God could afterward take to make the pillars of his own chosen people. No lesson in all the quarter do all of us need more than the lesson of Joseph's forgiveness of his brothers. Here is a case where a converted savage also shames our wicked grudges:

Jahilo, a New Hebrides chief, shot another chief because he had declared himself a Christian. Fortunately the wound did not prove fatal. The man was taken to the mission hospital for treatment, where he listened daily to the story of Christ. A few months after this shooting affair, Jahilo was wounded by a chief named Seoul. He was tenderly cared for by the native Christians and the missionaries, and soon gave evidence of a changed life. Hearing that Seoul was very ill, Jahilo obeyed the Bible injunction, "Love your enemies," and at once visited him. Seoul was dismayed, and in great fear chided the Christians who were with Jahilo. "Why have you brought him?" he said. "I have no pigs now with which to make peace with him, and why does he come when he knows I am ill?" "You do not need to make peace with me," replied

Jahilo tenderly. "Jesus has made me at peace have come to tell you to go to the mission hospita learn about Jesus and to get made better, and c back and lead your people to the worship." Seoul w and in two weeks was quite well.

Those who excuse themselves for their imperfect itation of the manliness of Christ because he was div we point not only to the manly Paul of the New Te ment, but also to the manly Joseph of the Old Testamen proving how much more like the Christ-pattern t your heart and mine it is possible for a human life to

Joseph's Brothers Make Obeisance to Him

Years ago a traveler in Burma left a copy of the Psalr at a house where he stayed. A native read the book, a resolved to cast away his idols. At last a missiona visited his village and gave him a New Testament. T story of salvation filled him with joy. "For twenty years, he said, "I have walked by starlight, now I see the sun. Joseph did not even have the Old Testament. Certain in this better age our ideal of manhood ought not to t lower than the manliness which Joseph made rea But his story teaches us that we cannot realize that b our own power. Hear Joseph as he stands befo Pharaoh to interpret his dream, speaking the secret of h success: "It is not in me; God shall give Pharaoh a answer of peace." The power to realize true manlines is not in me nor in you, but in God. "As many as re ceived Him, to them gave he power to become sons o God, even to them that believe on his name; which wer born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of th will of man, but of God." This new manliness is given to as many as receive Christ.

Moses' Foster-Mother

Long years of slavery came in as a part of Israel's training, when as slaves they made bricks and buil cities for Rameses II. Pithom was discovered in 1883. The lower courses of the walls, and for some distance up, are of well-made bricks with chopped straw in them; but higher up the courses of brick are not so good; the straw is long and scanty, and the last courses have in them no straw at all, but sedges, rushes, and water plants instead.

By one of the monuments we are brought literally face to face with her who had compassion on the little foundling of the Nile, and named him Moses, and adopted him as her own son. Her mummy was found at Thebes in 1881, together with those of several of the Pharaohs, notably her father, Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. There they lie in a row in the museum at Cairo, to be seen by all visitors. Nefer-ari was her name. As from the little acorn is developed the great oak, so from the little foundling of the Nile came the greatest human character, for it is said that in heaven a song shall be sung in which his name shall be coupled with that of Christ (Rev. 15:3).

Brightening Children's Evenings

SEVENTEEN years ago some English people interested in philanthropic projects became imbued with the idea that something ought to be done to give healthful amusement to the boys and girls of London's East End, and keep them off the streets during the evening hours. That the majority of the children took to romping in the streets and fell into bad company was little to be wondered at when the conditions in the places they called "home" are considered. The families, large in number, usually had but few rooms, and these dimly lighted. There the mother had to sew to help swell the meagre family income, and could do little in superintending the play of the children. In many cases a drunken father made the evening a time of terror until he dropped to sleep. To do what was possible for these children from London's darker side, the first Children's Happy Evening Association was formed, and the word "Joy" was taken for its motto. The Association bent its efforts to brighten the early years of children whose parents, owing to stress of work or on account of bad habits, could provide them with but the bare necessities of life. The members of the Association began to make regular visits to the homes of the East End, and, gathering groups of children about them, taught fascinating games of which the children had never heard; lessons of good conduct, orderliness and cleanliness were inculcated at the same time. Still, however, the Association felt that the work was but half done. The lanes and courts were the only real recreation grounds. By energetic effort on the part of volunteer workers, clean, well-lighted schoolrooms were provided. These were stocked with toys and they began to prove a strong counter attraction to the pastimes of the streets.

The "evenings," as the meetings are called, are held from six to eight o'clock, so that the children's time for going to bed be not interfered with. There are readings, stories are told and the children are taught fancy marches and drills. Often there are magic lantern exhibitions, when the "fairy tale" slides hold the children enraptured. Graphophone concerts are very popular with the young audiences. In the boys' room are found "indoor cricket," nine-pins and bagatelle sets.

In the girls' room are found quieter games, materials for painting, bead-work, and doll-dressing. Here concerts are given and stories are told, while busy fingers make quick work of the pleasant tasks assigned.

The rooms look very attractive to the children as they troop in on a rainy night. The bright lights make sharp contrast with the cold, gray fog without.

At the piano a girl of fourteen takes her place. A command is given, she strikes up a lively march. The children, who have fallen into line on the landing, come in two by two. Two ladies head the line and lead the fancy marches until the assembly bell rings. The march stops and the boys line up on one side, the girls on the other. One file goes to the doll-room, others to the painting-class; others to construct toys. Here and there among the busy groups move the men and women who have given up their own pleasure to add to that of the children. The members of the most aristocratic families in London are represented. The president of the council is the Countess of Jersey, wife of the seventh earl of that title. She is interested in everything that tends to add to the happiness and progress of young people. She is also an authoress of note. Mrs. Bland-Sutton is the secretary.

The president is H. R. H. the Princess of Wales. She takes great personal interest in the work, and sends many gifts and toys. Her interest has brought many ladies of the nobility to take an active part, and they give "treats" at frequent intervals for their charges.

The idea was too good to remain unappropriated by others, and provincial and colonial associations were formed. A close connection has been kept up with the parent organizations, as the affairs mentioned above have the general supervision of the branches outside of London as well as of those within the city. W. G. P.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A Reader. "I find your column most helpful to me. I gratefully acknowledge God's loving kindness, and thank him for hearing my unworthy prayers."

Mrs. M. H., California. "Either life or reason must have been lost in my hour of great trouble, if God had not rolled the burden away in answer to fervent prayer."

M. L. M., Massachusetts. "Some time ago my request for prayer was sent to the Bowery Mission through you. I asked that a great trouble which threatened me might be averted. The 'prayers of the righteous' have availed, and I am spared."

E. S., Ohio. "I know that God hears and answers our prayers, and I feel that he will carry us through every danger if we ask him in faith. My heart especially goes out in sympathy for the child that has no praying parents."

One of the Least, Illinois. "I have been a reader of the 'Answered Prayers' column for some time, and have been greatly helped by reading. I, too, know that God hears and gives direct answer to prayer when we pray in faith. He says, 'Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him and he shall bring it to pass.' And again, 'If God be for us, who can be against us?'"

BAD DREAMS

Caused by Coffee

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night, for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing nightmare.

"Finally, after hearing the experience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and gone to drinking Postum Food Coffee, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavour. It entirely took the place of coffee, and to my very great satisfaction, I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could warn every man, woman and child from the unwholesome, drug (caffeine) in ordinary coffee.

"People really do not appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what terrible effect it has on the human system. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hand in a fire after I had once been burned.

"A young lady friend of ours had stomach trouble for a long time, and could not get well as long as she used coffee. She finally quit it and began the use of Postum and is now perfectly well." "There's a reason." Read the little "Health Classic," "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

AN OLD EDITOR
Found $2000 Worth of Food

The editor of a paper out in Okla., said: "Yes, it is true what I get hold of Grape Nuts food, it was worth more than a $2000 doctor bill to me, for it made me a well man. I have gained 25 pounds in weight, my strength has returned tenfold, my brain power has been given back to me, and that is an absolute essential, for I am an editor and have been for 35 years.

"My pen shall always be ready to speak a good word for this powerful nutritive food. I had, of course, often read the advertisements regarding Grape Nuts, but never thought to apply the food to my own use until in my extremity and sickness the thought came to me that it might fit my case. The statements in regard to the food are absolutely correct, as I have proven in my own case. One very fortunate thing about the food is that while it is the most scientifically made and highly nourishing, concentrated food I have ever known, it has so delicious a taste that it wins and holds friends." "There's a reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

"WORK for him—that baby!" interposed the doctor, aghast.

"Yes; pull bastin's an'—an' other little things."

"Horrible!" muttered the doctor under his breath.

"Well, I—I did what I could, but I couldn't help it at all. He took her there ev'ry mornin' an' brought her home ev'ry night. I fed an' comforted an' petted the poor little thing then all I could, but of course I couldn't do much with Jack 'round. One mornin' Jack got madder than usual at me an' 'twas while he was chasin' me 'round the room with a chair that the little thing got scared an' run down the stairs. I never saw her again. I swear that's all I know, doctor."

"What was the man's name—where she—worked?"

"Tim Sullivan."

"Where did he live?"

Reluctantly Mrs. McGinnis gave the street and number.

"'Twa'n't but a little ways," she said, in anxious conciliation.

"When the little girl ran away that day was she dressed just as she was when she came to you?"

Mrs. McGinnis caught her breath sharply.

"N-no, sir," she stammered.

"What did she have on?"

"An old blue calico that had been my—my little girl's."

"Where was her own clothing?"

No answer.

"Mrs. McGinnis, where was Margaret's clothing?" repeated the doctor, sharply.

"My husband had—pawned them," confessed Mrs. McGinnis, miserably.

The doctor's lips parted. Then a sudden realization of what the woman before him had undergone on account of that same husband silenced the words on his tongue. Five minutes later he had left the house and was hurrying toward home.

In New York Tim Sullivan was, with some difficulty, found; and, supposing that the doctor's information was more extensive than it really was, Tim inadvertently admitted that the little Margaret had worked for him much longer than during the week she was with McGinnis. Hailing this clue with joy the doctor insisted upon admission to the work-room; but it was just here that he met with stout opposition. Diplomacy, threats and money, however, finally accomplished the seemingly impossible, and the doctor was admitted to the Sullivan home.

It looked much as it had in the days when Margaret pricked her fingers and entangled her thread over buttons that would lose themselves on the floor. To be sure, poor little Mrs. Sullivan and the puny baby no longer occupied the bed in the corner—they had found a quieter resting place—but there were just as many huge piles of unfinished garments; just as many pale faces and bent little bodies; just as many patient little fingers hard at work.

The doctor shuddered almost visibly, and determined that when Margaret was once found, places like Tim Sullivan's sweat-shop should receive a little attention on their own account—he had not supposed such dens existed. Now, however, he gave all his thoughts to the case in hand, and subjected each little laborer to long questioning and sharp scrutiny until he had convinced himself beyond any doubt that Margaret Kendall was not there.

"I told ye she wa'n't here," whined Sullivan, with an injured air. "She hain't been here fur years—an' when she was, she was jest like my own li'lle gal—my own li'lle gal, sir."

"But where is she now?"

"Sure, an' I don't know."

"Where did she go from here?"

"An' I don't know that."

Here again the doctor encountered the seemingly impossible, and here again diplomacy, threats and money worked wonders. Tim finally admitted that he had taken Margaret down to his cousin—a man who "could look after her better." To himself Tim Sullivan confessed that he "owed Tom a grudge, anyhow." Armed with the address of this man, the doctor started for the Bowery, hardly knowing whether to hope or to fear.

Tom Swaney and his paper bags, however, were nowhere to be found. Neighbors said that there had been such a person, and that he had employed children to work for him. Beyond that they knew nothing—at least they would tell nothing; and with this far from satisfactory information Doctor Spencer went back to his hotel thoroughly discouraged with his first week's work.

CHAPTER XIX

IT was in June that Maggie went to Mont-Lawn for the second visit. She had special charge this year of a little crippled boy who, but for her promising to look after him, could scarcely have gone at all. It was a very happy, joyous Maggie that renewed her acquaintance with old friends and songs, and made the acquaintance of new ones. Maggie was nine now, and a very different Maggie from the little mischievous, distrustful maid that had visited the place less than a year before, but Mont-Lawn was the same, and the long days of delight were the same, and Maggie was very sure she had never been so happy in her life.

It was early in the morning of the last one of the ten days that Maggie, looking more closely at the pretty little pictured face above her bed, noticed the name on the cot-card hanging near it.

"In loving memory of Margaret Kendall," she read slowly aloud. "Margaret Kendall," she repeated. "Why, that—" With a sudden cry she thrust her fingers into her dress and took out a tiny square of linen always kept pinned somewhere about her. It was yellow, and well worn with much handling and folding, but it was clean, and the name in the corner was still plainly to be read, "Margaret Kendall."

"It's the same, it's the same—I knew it was the same!" cried Maggie, dancing up and down. "She's got my name!"

"What is the same, dear?" asked one of the teachers, coming to Maggie's side.

"The name—look!" And Maggie held up the old handkerchief and pointed to the cot-card.

The teacher started as she read the two names. She knew the story of the picture and the cot-card, and as she looked keenly into the face of the eager little girl, she was sure she could see a resemblance to the picture of the five-year-old child above the bed.

"Where did you get that handkerchief, dear?" she asked a little tremulously.

Maggie shook her head.

"I don't know. I've always had it," she stammered, speaking in the slow, dazed way that was always hers when she was being questioned as to that dim, half-forgotten past.

"And is that your name—Margaret Kendall?"

"I don't know. I think so—but you see that was before—"

"Before? Before what?"

"Before—before the sweet-faced lady went away," replied Maggie, looking troubled and anxious. You see, I—I can't seem to remember. I've been 'Maggie' so long, but the handkerchief's mine; I'm sure of that. I've always had it. I—I didn't steal that!"

"No, dear, no," murmured the teacher, with a little break in her voice. "Come with me," she added, gathering up the handkerchief, the picture and the cot-card. "Come with me, dear, and we'll see if we can't find out what it all means."

Once more Maggie was eagerly ques-ned, and once more her puzzled little e was scrutinized by keen eyes that ked out point by point a resemblance the curly-headed little girl in the pic-e. The result of it all was a hurried-written letter addressed to "H. M. ncer, M.D."

"Dear Sir:—" ran the letter. "Some nths ago you forwarded in the name Mrs. Frank Kendall a photograph of a -year-old girl, and twenty-one dol-s to endow a cot at Mont-Lawn for season. You also gave something of sad history of the child, Margaret ndall, in whose memory the contribu-n was given. To-day one of our little ls, apparently about nine years old, ied the name on the cot-card, and pro-ced a fine linen handkerchief bearing same name. She claims both name d handkerchief as her own. She is e-eyed and golden-haired, and not un-e the photograph in many ways; reover she seems to have no rela-es that she knows anything about.

"All this, of course, may be a mere incidence, and may be raising false pes, but you will wish to investigate, are sure. We would suggest, how-er, that you look into the matter urself before communicating with the ther, lest our hopes prove groundless. e little girl, 'Maggie,' as she is called, es back to-morrow to New York, r ten days being over then. Perhaps u will visit the child in her home, and e for yourself whether she really is or not the lost Margaret Kendall. En-osed you will find card bearing name, ldress and all available information r ready reference. May the good God ide you in your search, and may it ad to success and happiness.

"Very sincerely yours,

"F. H. Clark."

This letter, together with other mail, as forwarded to New York from oughtonsville, and the doctor received at the end of his particularly dis-uraging first week's work. Scarcely aring to believe that the letter itself as a reality, he hurried at the earliest ossible moment to the address given, nd entered the basement room.

"An' is it after Maggie ye'd be a skin'?" demanded Mrs. Whalen, good-aturedly. "Sure, an' she ain't in, sor."

"But she'll be in soon?"

"Mebbe so, an' mebbe not. Thar's no ellin'. She's jest got home from that ere Mont-Lawn biz'ness, an' what with he singin' an' the story-tellin' an' all, he's mighty busy."

The doctor's face fell. His foot apped the floor nervously, and his im-patient eyes swept the poor little room, pausing at last on Mrs. Whalen's good-naturedly interested face.

"What sort of a little girl is this—Maggie?" he asked.

"Sure, an' it's an angel she is, sor, straight from hiven," declared the woman. "She's that handy with the kids hat it's a pleasure jest ter be seein' her round. An' what with her bright, cheery ways, the hull block's under her thumb, an' she can do anythin' she likes with the hull kit of 'em. But you'd oughter seen her before, sor!"

"Before?"

"Before she went up-country whar them songs she's been a-larnin' was sung, I mean. She was a holy tirror—she was; an' thar ain't a man, woman or child in the Alley that will tell ye diff'rent. What with her—"

There was a sudden rush of steps at the door, and Doctor Spencer turned to meet a pair of wide blue eyes that he would have known in the uttermost parts of the world.

"Margaret—little Margaret! You are Margaret Kendall!" he cried joyously.

CHAPTER XX

AFTER that first look into the child's blue eyes Doctor Spencer had not doubted that he had found the real Margaret, but he determined to make no mistake. The child should be taken first to Mrs. McGinnis, and if she and Bobby said it was the same little girl that had come to them four years before, he would be sure indeed. As far as Margaret herself was concerned, he knew of no way but to tell her the truth, for she, too, must help in the identification.

"And it's my mother—my really truly mother?" she demanded eagerly.

"We hope so, dear, and we think so. I am very sure it is your mother."

"And she didn't die?"

"No, dear."

There was a long pause. The doctor and Margaret were on their way to Houghtonsville, and the little girl's eyes were fixed on the flying trees outside the window. At last she turned and regarded the man at her side with a troubled gaze.

"Doctor Spencer, does mother—want—me?" she asked timidly.

"More than anything else in the world," returned the man, a little unsteadily. "She has longed for you all these years."

"Oh-h!" breathed the little girl, ecstatically. "I like to be wanted, you know."

The doctor smiled a bit sadly—he, too, would like "to be wanted" in this particular case—then he looked down at the little girl near him. He was glad that there would be no heartache in the first glance that the mother would catch of her child. Margaret, in the dainty new garments the doctor had bought for her, looked almost as well-fed and well-cared-for as had the little five-year-old maid left in the Grand Central Station four years before. His thoughts were interrupted by a light touch on his arm.

"Doctor Spencer, please," began Margaret again, "is my mother's house big?—real big?"

"Why—yes," returned the doctor.

"And has it got grass 'round it, and trees?"

"Yes."

Margaret's eyes began to shine. She gave a delighted little bound on the seat as she demanded:

"And is she rich? awful rich?"

The doctor frowned. This anxiety for wealth was not quite what he liked to see. Margaret noticed the frown and the hesitating manner, and her face fell.

"O dear! I'm so sorry. I did so hope she was rich!"

"Why?" asked the doctor, almost sharply.

Margaret sighed.

"Well, you see," she began timidly, "there's all the Whalens, and Timmy Carney and Mis' Lindenbaum, and—oh, lots of others, and they haven't ever been to Mont-Lawn—some of them couldn't, anyhow, 'cause they're too big, you know. And I thought if my mother's house was big and had trees and grass, and if she could 'ford it, why maybe she'd ask 'em to—to come and see us, you know."

"Oh!" said the doctor with a broad smile as he thought of his fears of a moment before. "Well, we'll see about that later, my dear. I am positive, however, that your mother will be glad to have you tell about the Whalens and Timmy and the rest, and she will have something to propose that will make them all happy, I'm sure. And now we're almost there ourselves."

At Houghtonsville Doctor Spencer lifted Margaret into his waiting carriage, and told old Nathan to drive them straight to the Merton farmhouse. Much to his disappointment, however, Margaret failed to recognize either Bobby or his mother.

"After all, it ain't so strange, doctor," comforted Mrs. McGinnis. "She was such a little thing, an' she stayed such a little bit of time. Besides, Bobby's changed a lot, an' I reckon I don't look quite the same."

"But it is she—it is the little girl that came to you?" begged the doctor.

"Why, yes, I think so," assured Mrs. McGinnis, "but you see I didn't have her long, an'—an' she cried' most the time she was there—poor dear!"

The doctor was silent. The child, too, was silent. A look of terror was creeping into her blue eyes.

After the Bitlis Earthquake

Missionary Cole Describes the Terrible Suffering and How the Appeal for Relief Was Answered

WRITING from "Bitlis Under Canvas," April 5, Rev. R. M. Cole sends this most interesting account of the situation there after the great earthquake and before help came to the sufferers:

"After some days of damp snow, sleet, slush and rain, on Friday, the 29th ult., at ten o'clock A.M., the unwelcome visitor burst in upon us all unannounced. Almost immediately our city seemed in the jaws of some fearful monster who would shake us into shreds. Down came plastering, upset were bottles and dishes, liquids spilt and clocks stopped; crevices opened in strong walls, two-feet-thick dirt roofs were so shattered that muddy water poured down in abundance to ruin furnishings below, while the more frail walls fell down.

"The first day witnessed fourteen shocks, mostly tremulous and lateral, ten of which came off in the short space of two hours. Of some 4,000 houses in town, it is estimated 300 have fallen, while of the remainder half are damaged. Officials report ten deaths and fifteen wounded, though I fear it is too low an estimate. Two butchers, Hagop and Jango, were buried in their falling shops; a Kurd, Halit, his wife and two sons were buried in the debris of their house. A. K. Hamzeh was killed and his daughter's limbs were broken. Down fell a stone upon the head of another Kurd and killed him, while a poor woman of his race was wailing and saying their wall had so pinned their little daughter to the ground that to save her life they had cut off her arm. Other casualties are happening every day from toppling over of shattered walls.

"Nearly all are now living out on the snows with such booths and tents as they could improvise. Most churches and mosques are more or less damaged. The large Protestant church, resting on firm stone arches, though cracked in several places, does not seem dangerous, and has been a rendezvous for our numerous orphans, school children and others. A most weird, gruesome experience it has been to listen to the wailing intonations of the Moslem multitude gathered here and there to offer a sort of Amen! to the prayer of the mullah that Allah would prevent further shocks. But now that the shocks are receding, their wails are no longer heard. Armenians, Syrians, Catholics, etc., also put up their prayers. The Protestants had their usual service at noon on Sunday, and some three hours later came one of the most damaging shocks. The shocks do not seem to have extended far; 150 houses have suffered greatly in Khoultig.

"We all are most grateful for such prompt and generous help as our friends have sent on for the sufferers—the first fifty pounds ($250) being from that paper, so wide-awake, so ready and so sympathetic in such distress, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of the Bible House, New York City, and its generous readers. God bless all our kind patrons, wherever found!

"Since the dire event of the 29th ult., the 'quakes have been easily counted up to thirty-five or forty, while some more timid would make them out much more, but only those of the 29th and 30th ult. were, or are, particularly disastrous. But with so many shattered walls all around, and amid such terrible rains, still more buildings keep falling. We fear that not a few here and in the damaged villages must die from hunger and exposure out upon the snows, for few dare yet to venture into any buildings.

"Never have we seen such suffering here, or at Erzerum, during our forty years in this land, and it appears all the more, as villagers rush in to tell their sad stories. Up to the present from that first fifty pounds have come four hundred liras ($1,760) in equal amounts to our German associates and ourselves, theirs from Germany and ours from America, as also one hundred from the Armenian patriarch for his prelacy here, we to pass it to the aged abbot and his council. The local government, too, seems to be moving, but in a small, unsatisfactory way, probably owing to want of money. The officers and others are warm in their compliments of the German-American relief movement, which we started, and which matured so promptly as almost to take their breath away. We have about three thousand names of sufferers on our list, who are supplied with tickets on the various bakeries.

"With renewed and deepest gratitude,

"R. M. COLE."

The World's Oldest Minister

THE Rev. Thomas Lord, of England, has just entered upon his one hundredth year, and he is probably the oldest minister in the world who is still in active service. This veteran of the pulpit retired from the ministry nearly thirty years ago; but frequently preaches in chapels in the district where he resides, besides taking part in temperance meetings, in which work he has been an enthusiast nearly all his life.

When asked to explain the secret of his long life, Mr. Lord instantly replied that there was no secret in it:

"It is the duty of every Christian," he said, "to use his own common sense and to be moderate in all things. By doing that, I have lived to be over ninety-nine."

Rev. Thomas Lord, Aged 100

While abstaining from intoxicating liquors, Mr. Lord has also abstained from using tobacco. On one occasion, an old lady advised him to take to smoking, saying that a minister could think better with a pipe in his mouth. The reply was characteristic of the man:

"No," he answered, "if that is where thought comes from, I would rather not think at all."

This venerable minister takes his turn with other pastors in conducting services at the Horncastle Workhouse on every Wednesday, and not long ago he was engaged in preparing a new lecture on temperance. He is a living example of how a man, by hard work and careful living, can be preserved to a ripe old age.

AUNT HANNAH'S IDEA

NE day as I was working in my kitchen, Aunt Hannah walked in with an air of great decision, and seating herself on the edge of a chair, exclaimed: "I'm goin' to have a 'fresh air' of my very own. I've allers wanted one, but live 'way back here and I never have a chance. But there's that Mont-Lawn THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tells about. I'm bound to send one poor child out there myself."

Oh, Aunt Hannah, how can you? You need every cent you can earn for yourself."

"Well, I've allers heard 'where there's a will there's a way.' I've ben plannin' to paint an' paper an' whitewash my settin'-room and mebbe have some muslin for curtains, and I 'lowed it would cost 'bout three dollars—just what it would take to send a child to Mont-Lawn. Now, my settin'-room needs paperin', to be sure; but I've got some I can mend it with, and my shaders have got shades and I have a beautiful view from them. I can see the lake and the hills and woods, and those poor little mites never saw the grass nor trees, let alone flowers, and some of them never saw the sky, unless they've seen it between the tops of high buildin's, and never heard a bird sing, while I have a perfect concert every mornin'. I've lived amongst such things all my life till I've forgot how to be thankful. I owe the Lord a thank offerin' any way, and when I think of them poor children I'm heartsick."

"Yes, but how are you going to get the money?"

"Well, you see I was brought up on a farm and allers had the care of lambs and can make them live when others can't, so Deacon Jones, he said he'd give me the first one that was likely to die, so he sent over one and I barely saved its life; but now it's such a fine one he says he'll give me three dollars for it if I'll keep it till fall and he'll pay me now. It's the lovingest thing I've got on my place—follers me everywhere.

"No wonder the Saviour talks about lambs—they're so innocent," the old lady continued, "and he tells us to 'feed his lambs,' and of course that means children. Now I'm goin' to make my lamb feed one of his dear little lambs by sendin' it out of them dreadful slums into his air and sunlight. Course I'll miss it dreadfully, but I'll have my cow and pig and hens. You ought to see my chickens! People say I have great luck, but I think the Lord just blesses me and I am just runnin' over with joy. But I must go to work now."

I thought of that passage, "Provoking one another to good works." For of course I wasn't going to let that poor woman get clear out of sight of the rest of us in benevolence. I went out calling that afternoon and told others about it. We talked it over and at the next social we had articles on Mont-Lawn and on the great need of the children and planned to have a supper; and that, with the aid of some of the well-to-do men, who didn't want to be outdone by the poorest woman in the village, amounted to thirty dollars, besides a quantity of second-hand clothing.

And the end is not yet, for Aunt Hannah was as enthusiastic as ever, and started a quilt, with ten cents for the privilege of having your name on it, and she says she's going to have a quilting with a supper when it is ready to quilt. She is right in her element now, and said to me the other day:

"I believe I'm the richest poor woman, the youngest old woman, and the happiest lone woman in this town, for I'm thinkin' all the time how those children will enjoy Mont-Lawn, where they'll have enough to eat for once in their lives."

MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

TRUE AND FALSE AMBITION*

NEW ideas of greatness, as well as of goodness, were imparted by Christ to his disciples. It is not wonderful that they were "astonished at his doctrine," it was so opposed to all the recognized principles of the world, and especially those of the Jews. They estimated men according to their possessions, but he told them that the man's life consisted not in the abundance of the things he possessed. Hoarding was the first principle of life, but he said, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures." The manly man was he who insisted on his rights, but he said, "Blessed are the meek." And now, when two of his disciples urged their desire to occupy the places of honor in his kingdom, he answered, "Whosoever of you would be first, shall be servant of all."

Put in this direct form, it must have surprised those ambitious peasants, but it was a profound truth that the world has always recognized. Ambitious men have forced themselves to the front and have compelled admiration and honor, but it has been grudgingly given. The willing tribute rendered by the world is given to the man who serves it best. The names that history keeps emblazoned on its record are not those of the rich, the selfish or the ambitious, but those of the men who have given service of one kind or another. Of all the princes of Italy who have ruled there, not one is held in such reverence as Garibaldi, who sacrificed himself that his country might be free. Of all the churchmen who have held the richest emoluments, who is there that has the fame of Luther, or Knox, or Wesley? Among literary men there have been many who have won wealth, yet those we remember best are such men as Homer the blind beggar, Milton, Shakespeare, Burns. Bunyan, who were all poor, but whose works are most precious. Christ uttered a sublime truth when he said that the way to be chief is to serve.

Young men need to learn the lesson that selfishness in any form is a bar to greatness. Why should these two disciples have asked for those high places in the kingdom? The other disciples had equal claims. Ambition is right and just if it is for the things that are really valuable. The ambition to be a great statesman, a great lawyer, a great artist, is natural, but it too often degenerates into an ambition to be called great, not to be really great. It is too often the desire to be more famous than some one else, rather than to be more useful than some one else; to have a great reputation rather than to have a great character; to be famous and honored rather than to deserve fame and honor. The model Christ himself gave of ministering rather than being ministered unto, should be the model of all his people.

"I Kept the Light Burning"

A PATHETIC story is told of the wife of the keeper of a lighthouse on a lonely island, who saw her husband and his two assistants swept away by breaking ice-floes, leaving her alone to face a long and dreary winter, with the memory of the terrible and tragic scene which she had witnessed. Months after this tragedy the government supply ship reached the island on its semi-annual visit. The men on the vessel were accustomed to stories of privation and heroism, but there was something that gripped at their hearts a little harder than usual when they learned how much she had suffered. "How did you ever manage to get through the winter?" "I hardly know," she replied, with a suppressed sob that had heart-break in it; "I hardly know; I only know that I kept the light burning."

Oh, those faithful lights! None but God knows what they mean. They are not for sailors alone. Sometimes they shine from farmhouse windows; sometimes down city streets; sometimes from human lives. Out on the plains there is a certain gate-post where a lighted lantern has hung every night for seventeen years, ever since a boy disappeared from home. The father, now old and sorrow-stricken, carries it out every night, no matter how great the storm, praying that it may guide his boy home.

THE MESSAGE O'ER THE 'PHONE

By Margaret E. Sangster

"HELLO, papa! this is Ethel!"
Sweet and clear the childish tone
Wakes the echoes in the office
Where the father sits alone,
Breaking in its wistful pleading
On his world of toils and cares,
"Hello, papa, aren't you coming Home to hear me say my prayers?"

"Hello, papa!" sweet and eager
Thrills the little winsome cry,
And the father hears it calling
Where the tempter's spells are nigh.
In the feverish haunt of pleasure,
In the gilded gay saloon,
To the man of home forgetful
Comes the baby's tender croon.

Standing in her little nightgown,
Dimpled hands and dimpled feet,
Flower-like face 'neath golden ringlets,
Pure as snow and blossom-sweet.
Ah! how close would mother fold her,
Were that angel mother here!
Silently the mother's spirit
Sent to guard her, hovers near.

Winsome child and angel mother,
Both unite to call him home.
If in paths of sin and sorrow,
Tried and tempted he may roam.
"Hello, papa! in your study
I am waiting, if you please.
I can't hear you, won't you answer?"
Is he deaf to words like these?

Many a time to men who wander
Far from love and far from home,
Whispers sweet with childish pleading
Soft as angel-echoes come.
"Hello, papa! 'tis your darling,
She's without you, all alone."
And the child's voice rings like heaven
Through an unseen telephone.

A Memorable Communion

THE May communion Sunday at the Congregational Church of Northfield, Mass., will long be remembered by all who were present. Ninety-three persons were then received into the church, largely as the outcome of meetings conducted by Dr. R. A. Torrey last February.

Previous to this revival, the townspeople looked back to the 70's, when Mr. D. L. Moody and Mr. Ira D. Sankey held meetings, at which many were converted from Unitarianism, among them Mr. Moody's mother, brother and other near relatives. Since then, the schools and conferences for which Northfield has become world-famous were established, and each year saw increasing numbers gather in the quiet New England town for spiritual profit and inspiration. Of course the townspeople were profited also, and there have been many outpourings of grace. But a new generation has grown up, and new families have now come to reside in town.

Copyright, 1906, by A. R. Levering

Rev. N. Fay Smith

An invitation was sent to Dr. Torrey to hold services in the schools and in the town church, and he was able to give five days between his Cleveland and Buffalo campaigns last February. The Spirit of God was poured out so abundantly that over one hundred and sixty persons professed to receive Christ as Saviour and Lord, were dealt with individually and then confessed him as such in the public meetings.

For weeks previous to the meetings, the pastor, Rev. N. Fay Smith, had preached searching sermons to both saved and unsaved, had organized cottage prayer-meetings and done everything possible to create an atmosphere in which Dr. Torrey's work would be easy and fruitful. Mr. Smith is one of the early students of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, where he was taught and trained by Dr. Torrey himself and so knew about what Dr. Torrey would like. The large additions to the local church at the recent communion is part of the permanent fruit of the revival. Of the ninety-three new members, seventy-five were received on confession of faith, eighteen by letter. No Mount Hermon students were included (Mount Hermon school has its own church four miles away), and only about fifteen seminary girls, the remainder being townspeople.

While there were a few old people—a beautiful story is told of one old couple who separately made up their mind that their course was nearly run, and that it was time they received and confessed Christ as Saviour and Lord—and some in middle life, the majority were young people of both sexes just entering upon life. Many homes were represented by two or three persons. Among the number was a granddaughter of D. L. Moody (Emma Moody Fitt), also a granddaughter of Major D. W. Whittle (Dorothy Whittle), while Miss Alice Varley, daughter of the well-known evangelist Henry Varley, joined by letter.

Ever since the meeting, the pastor has held a "Berean Bible class" every Tuesday evening for the instruction of the converts in the fundamental truths of the Bible and simple facts in the Christian life. A "Boys' Brigade" meets on Friday nights with a membership of over thirty. The old parsonage has been turned into a "parish house" or social centre, which is badly needed for the young people in such a community. The spirit of revival lives on, and changed lives are witnessing to the thoroughness and effectiveness of the work.

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. E. Ridgely, of Olney, Ill., died on February 6, after a useful Christian life.

Nina M. McQuiston, of Gerlaw, Ill., entered into rest on February 15. "Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep."

Mrs. Rebecca F. Armstrong, a long time and faithful friend of The Christian Herald, died a happy Christian on February 2, at Chicago, Ill.

At the age of seventy-five years, Mrs. Mary E. Woodson, of Hutchinson, Kansas, passed away on March 8. Her life was devoted to the Master's service.

Mrs. Mary B., widow of John W. Ayars, died in New Richland, Minn., on December 30, 1906, aged eighty years. Her six children all survive her and rejoice in the memory of their mother's Christian womanhood.

John Deeds died in Ligonier, Pa., on the 14th of March, aged seventy-three years. He had been a quiet, consistent follower of the Master for forty years. His sorrowing widow is sustained by a sure hope of reunion.

Cynthia Hunt, widow of Simon Hamilton, passed away in Issaquah, Wash., on the 7th of March, in her eighty-fourth year. But one daughter survives of the six children born to her. Mrs. Hamilton lived a joyous Christian life and died in triumphant faith, loved by all who knew her.

Johnnie Nichols, the twelve-year old son of John J. and Jeannette Nichols, of Palo Alto, Cal., was drowned in the lake at Stanford University in June, 1906. Little Johnnie was a favorite with old and young, many of whom pay glowing tribute to his purity of mind and active, reliable nature. "Untrodden from the world," the lad has gained heaven in his youth.

Mrs. Abigail Whitmore Holt died at Hamilton N. Y., on April 9, 1907, at the age of ninety-one. For many years she was a subscriber to The Christian Herald, and hailed its weekly visit with joy. The sermons published in its pages were a source of great comfort. She came to a gracious and beautiful old age and passed away leaving behind her the fragrant memory of a life of unselfish service for others.

Mrs. Mary A., widow of David H. Williams, of Schenectady, N. Y., passed from earth on March 12, in the eighty-eighth year of her age. For many years a "shut-in," she lived an earnest Christian life, never losing her interest in the Baptist Church with which she was affiliated. For fifteen years she depended upon The Christian Herald for religious and missionary information.

The earthly tabernacle is dissolved,
And her freed spirit drops its house of clay;
From fears and doubts removed, from sin absolved,
Gladly she welcomes the eternal day.
A crown of life encircles now her head,
And, clad in robes of immortality,
She sees with unveiled eye Him who hath said,
"Ye weary, heavy laden, come to me."

Among the Workers

—Mr. John M. Glenn, who has assumed the work of carrying out Mrs. Sage's wishes with regard to the $10,000,000 Sage Foundation, is a wealthy Maryland lawyer, with a large experience in humanitarian enterprises.

Rev. Frank H. L. Paton, son of the late Rev. John G. Paton, the famous missionary to the New Hebrides, writes to The Christian Herald that his father's last hours were serene and unclouded, and that he rested peacefully on God's promises and Christ's sacrifice. Many ministers and friends came to see the dying saint.

—Beloit, Kan., has been the scene of a notable revival. Evangelist Biederwolf conducted services during two weeks. Nearly five hundred made open profession of faith in Christ. At the last evening service more than fifty merchants, farmers and heads of families were among those who decided for Christ.

PERSONAL QUESTIONS

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ooking back at the narratives of the arly books of the Bible, many per- onal questions suggest themselves. s begin with Jacob's vision. Have r had a meeting with God such as had? Has the heaven ever been so to me that I have known the need of der up to heaven, because I knew n cut me off from God? He was up in heaven, all holy, and I a able sinner down here on earth, far om God. Have my dreams been of way of getting at God? or am I in a state of hardness that I have at of houses, or riches, or fine clothes? arriage or of pleasure? Have I been broken-hearted because I never had a real, true meeting with which has changed my whole life? an unsaved sinner still? Or am I e child of God? Do I know him? he made promises to me through his d, applied by the Holy Ghost, and I been like Jacob, when God said to "Behold, I am with thee, and will thee in all places whither thou , and will bring thee again into this for I will not leave thee, until I done that which I have spoken to of?" Have I doubted God, and of him, "If God will be with me," Have I wronged God by my un- f? Have I treated him as though vere such an one as myself, quite ble of making a promise and then ing back? Have I suspected him of ithfulness? Have I said in my heart, n I have proved that God means t he says, then I will commit myself im? "If God will be with me, and keep me in the way that I go, and give me bread to eat, and raiment to on, so that I come again to my father's e in peace, then shall the Lord be my God; . . . and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee?" Can I have been so mean, so unbelieving?

Has another time come in my life when God has met me a second time, when I have come to some great crisis like that of Jacob, when, with terror, he expected Esau to meet him in anger, and he did not know whether his life or that of his wives and children would be spared? Have I done as Jacob did? Have I done all that lay in my power to save myself and my belongings and then, as a last resource, gone to God to help me out? And has he met me, lamed me, taken from me my self-reliance, and taught me, at last, to cease from self, and to trust him, so making me, crippled and halting in myself, a prince with God?

Have I learned the many lessons in the life of Joseph? Have I had from God dreams of a future which God has reserved in heaven for me, when, if I have suffered with Christ, I shall also reign with him (II. Tim. 3: 12)? Have I been enabled by his grace to come through trials in my own home, from those nearest to me, hating me for my faith in God? or among strangers, misunderstood, persecuted, wronged? Have I learned to "endure grief, suffering wrongfully," and to accept as a privilege so to suffer, that God might be glorified in making me like Jesus? Have I been unselfish, when enduring wrongs, as Joseph was in prison, and, instead of pitying myself, have I put aside my own troubles to help others? And then, when God has put my feet in a large room, and given me a position of power, influence or wealth, have I, like Joseph, faithfully sought to be the servant of all men, living only to do good to others?

MOSES AS HERO*

NIQUE in the world's history stands the life and character of Moses, the eler and lawgiver of the Hebrew people, s is drawn for us in the Bible. His was eroic, noble, self-sacrificing career, in ch he gave himself to ceaseless toil and ry and anxiety, closing with no reward the consciousness of having accom- hed the thing he undertook, and the spect, which could not have been clear im, of world-wide and eternal fame. task to which he gave his life was stu- dous. To remove a whole people, with nen and children, flocks and herds, out the grasp of a powerful and civilized ion; to take them out into the desert organize them, care for their com- sariat, provide for their sanitary and al life; drill the men into a fighting y and provide them with weapons; and pel into loyalty and obedience the t stubborn race the world has ever own, was an undertaking greater than xander, Wellington, or Napoleon ever empted. His work, too, was well done. e code of laws he promulgated was ctly suited to the condition of the peo- and would alone have given him first k among the legislators of the world. a leader, too, he has never been sur- sed. His vigor in enforcing discipline, pressing mutiny, preventing pillage, and with inadequate means, showed mar- ous resource. The secret of his greatness openly avowed in his narrative. God s with him, directing and assisting him, erwise no human being could have suc- ded in the face of such difficulties. The beginning of his work showed the rling character of the man. If we may st Josephus, the first ordeal Moses en- red was more severe than the Bible inti- mates. A slave, by a romantic episode placed in a palace, educated and trained, he became a great general, leading the Egyptian armies to victory. It would have been natural in him to have ignored his origin and to have become a prince and a ruler in Egypt. Instead of this, he espoused the cause of his people and undertook to emancipate them. This, too, in spite of their ingratitude and their desire to be left in peace to serve their masters. There must have been a struggle in his mind before he could renounce fame, and wealth, and power to become the leader of such a horde as the Israelites then were. It would have been an impossible career if he had not believed implicitly in God's power and fidelity.

The Liberal Soul

The story is told of a collector who called upon a man for his contribution to the Gospel work. He was not a wealthy man, but he did his own work upon his farm. He looked over his books, and said his contribution would be $70. "Why this remarkable benevolence?" asked the collector. He replied: "Six years ago I felt I was not giving enough to the Lord's work, so I resolved to give in proportion to my blessings, and I hit upon this plan: I will give 5 cents for every bushel of wheat I raise, 3 cents for every bushel of corn I raise, and 10 per cent. for the wool, butter, etc., that I sell. The first year I gave $20; the second, $35; the third, $47; the fourth, $49; the fifth, $59, and this year my contribution is $70. For twenty years previous my doctor bills had not been less than $20 per year, but for the last six years they have not exceeded $2 a year. I tell you it is true that 'there is that scattereth and yet increaseth,' and 'the liberal soul shall be made fat.'"

Questions and Answers

Estella, Germantown, Pa. Are gipsies called by that name in other lands as well as our own?

No. In some parts of Europe they are known as Bohemians; in Portugal they are Ciganos; in Spain Gitanos; in Holland Heidens (heathen); in Hungary Pharaohnepek (Pharaoh's people); in India Sinte or Sindi; in Sweden Tatare; in Germany Zigeuner.

J. W. H., Wallaceburg, Can. When Christ said (Luke 17:21) "The kingdom of God is within you" did he imply that the Pharisees to whom he spoke might lay claim to that possession?

He meant that the kingdom was within every man whose character and principles were those of the kingdom. The Pharisees or any others might have it within them if they would. They were expecting a temporal kingdom, as all the Jews of that time were, and they asked when it would come. His reply was to discourage them from looking for a worldly kingdom that would come with splendor and glory, but to look within and see if God was ruling in their hearts. The kingdom would come for them when they were surrendered to God.

H. D., Stevens Point, Wis. Will you kindly give me some facts relating to the climate, people and products of the Bermuda Isles? Is the cost of living moderate?

The Bermudas are accessible from New York by about forty-eight hours' voyaging. Their silver-sanded beaches, coral caves, cedar-crowned hills, land-locked bays and balmy atmosphere render them delightful places of sojourn for invalids and others. There are now good hotels to be found, sanitary conditions are much improved and railroads connect the principal points upon the various islands. The hotels are not cheap, but living and service are moderate in the homes.

E. B. Dayton, O. What is the total strength of the Protestant missionary army in all lands at the present time?

Ordained missionaries, 5,937; laymen, 2,725; single women, 4.257; wives of missionaries, 5,772; total, 18,691.

M. F. S., Philadelphia, Pa. What is meant by these lines at the close of Tennyson's "In Memoriam"

"One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event
To which the whole creation moves"?

In the late edition issued with the author's notes and edited by his son Hallam (The Macmillan Co., publishers), it is explained that the lines referred to the full realization of God's love for man, the oneness of God with man, and of man with man in Him—in other words, the complete spiritualization of man's nature and the redemption of the world.

J. J., Waterbury, Conn. 1. What are the principal problems to be discussed by the Hague Conference which meets this month? 2. What does the name of the building where it meets—"The Ridderzaal" mean?

1. The leading propositions are (a) a general arbitration treaty; (b) an arrangement for stated meetings of the Conference; (c) inviolability of neutral private property in war time; (d) no armed intervention for the collection of private claims by one government against another; (e) whatever action is necessary to establish the permanency of the Hague Court and its recognition as an authoritative international advisory tribunal. 2. It means "Hall of the Knights."

Mr Dan. Carpenter of Gashland, Mo., writes apropos of the oldest Sunday School superintendent discussion:

The record of Mr. A. S. Riland as superintendent of Sunday School is certainly good and interesting reading. I was elected superintendent of our Sunday School in Barry, March, 1880, and am still serving a continuous forty-seven years. In 1865, I was living in Kansas City, was elected and served six months as superintendent of a newly organized Sunday School. I am now serving my fifth year at Gashland. In the morning I serve at Barry and in the afternoon at Gashland. Altogether I have served fifty-seven and a half years, a little short of Brother Riland's term. Over two hundred and fifty of the class members were added to the church, or rather to different denominations, as no disputed doctrines were ever allowed to be taught. Six have gone from our classes and have been successful superintendents of schools; some far away. One young man is now an honored and esteemed minister, working for the Master. A young lady organized a Sunday School, resulting in a church organization through which more than two hundred have been added to the army of Christian workers.

Another veteran Sunday School superintendent has been heard from. Mr. William H. Levering's record is as follows:

Born April, 1826, near Philadelphia, he began attendance July, 1828 (79 years); made chorister June, 1834 (73 years), and continues to this time; began playing violoncello in public in his 12th year; in his 14th year (March, 1840) was converted, joined the Baptist Church and then began taking part in public worship; was elected superintendent when 19 years old (1845) and continued practically to this day. In 1866 he took up mission and interdenominational Sunday School work, organized a mission in city suburbs and at same time led in two Sunday Schools of colored people in the city and continued nearly 24 years, much of this time as superintendent and sole teacher. In the 1850's and 1860's he taught Scripture lessons by normal methods. In May, 1865, he helped organize the Indiana Sunday School Association and has continued officially to this time, and is elected for life. For many years he served as its president and traveled and organized Sunday School Associations in every one of the 92 counties of the State, from 1873 and onward during many years. In 1866-67 he helped to organize his own (Tippecanoe) county Sunday School Union, and has been officially connected with it ever since; is now serving his 29th year as president and is elected for life.

Still another veteran, Mr. James M. Cox of Lambertville, N. J., has a surprising record. For forty-five years he has held the superintendency of the Sandy Ridge Baptist Sunday School in that district.

H. R., Columbus, O. Where is "delft" earthenware made? Is it a modern product?

It is manufactured at Delft, in Holland, a town founded by Godfrey le Bossu, in 1074. The famous "earthenware" was first made here in 1310. The sale of delft declined after potteries were started in Germany and England.

Jere M., Paterson, N. J. Yes; the revival hymn, "Get Right with God," can be ordered at this office in leaflet form at ten cents per hundred, words and music.

When and where was the first Freewill Baptist Church founded in America?

Elder Benjamin Randall, a convert of Whitefield, organized the first church in Durham, N. H., June 30, 1780.

How high is the Matterhorn Peak in Switzerland?

About 14,836 feet.

Several Readers. Eleanor H. Porter's beautiful story, "Into Still Waters," the last instalment of which appears in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will shortly be published in book form by the W. A. Wilde Company, Boston, under the new title of Cross Currents. Mrs. Porter's clever and realistic delineations of child life in the slums, and the touching recital of the experiences of little Margaret, should attract many readers.

Unveiling the Hamilton Statue at Paterson, N. J.

THE people of Paterson, N. J., recently erected a monument in honor of Alexander Hamilton, the statesman, who was the founder of the city. The statue is in front of the City Hall, and thousands attended the unveiling. The lady who drew the cord that dropped the flag from the statue was a descendant of Hamilton. There are several statues to the memory of Hamilton in various cities, but this is considered by critics to be one of the finest. Members of the Grand Army, patriotic societies and delegations from the public schools were present.

M. R. W., Newburgh, N. Y. Will the "Lend-a-Hand" Society, founded by Edward Everett Hale, die with him? When was it founded and has its work been practical?

The Society was founded about thirty-six years ago. On Dr. Hale's eighty-fifth birthday, the members instituted a movement involving its permanent endowment, through a committee including five members of the United States Senate, college presidents, editors and ambassadors. Considering its resources, its practical work has been remarkable.

F. H., Bismarck, N. D. 1. What is the "Rosetta stone"? 2. How are we to understand the claim that the planet Mars or any other affects the weather?

1. A stone covered with strange engraved characters, which was found near the mouth of the Nile in 1798 by French engineers. It dates from 136 B.C. The characters are in hieroglyphic, in demotic and Greek. It is now in the British Museum and relates to events in the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes 2. It is only conjecture. While the planet may affect our atmosphere, their influence is not so well defined as to be appreciable.

S. H. G., Bennings, D. C. Does OUR MAIL-BAG know of any clearly outlined highroad for automobiles between Washington and the west coast? An interested quartette anxiously await a reply.

In 1802 Jefferson signed a bill for the survey of a national pike through the passes of the Appalachians (this "Cumberland" pike was originally a path worn deep by the pounding hoofs of millions of buffaloes, which in 1825 was extended across the Ohio and through the middle West to St. Louis. Road folk all over the country are pledged to support a movement for the reconstruction of this American "Appian Way," which will sweep on from St. Louis in two great highways—one via Montana to Puget Sound, the other through Denver and Salt Lake, over the Rockies and Sierras to San Francisco. The Congressman from Maryland has introduced a bill providing for the speedy accomplishment of this undertaking.

Mrs. G. M. R., Columbus, O. What is the color of the descendants of Shem, Ham and Japheth?

Shem's descendants are generally believed to be the olive-skinned races, Ham's the brown or black races, and Japheth's the fair-skinned races.

M. P., Tennessee City, Tenn. When did the great ice sheet cover North America? 2. Who is president of Mexico? 3. Who was the first circumnavigator of the globe? 4. Where is Acadia?

1. It is impossible to give any date. The best scientists do not attempt to. 2. President Porfirio Diaz, born in Oaxaca, in 1830. He has been president of Mexico since 1884. 3. Magellan, a native of Portugal in the Spanish service, sailed from San Lucar Sept. 20, 1519, with five ships, one of which succeeded in circumnavigating the globe. The voyage took three years. The second circumnavigator was Grijalva, Spaniard. He sailed in 1537. 4. Acadia was the name given by the French to the territory now known as the two British provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in North America. The first colony at Port Royal, now Annapolis, was founded by Pourtrincourt, in 1605.

CHINA'S MISSIONARY CENTENNIAL

The Great Conference Just Closed at Shanghai and Its World-Wide Influence

T Shanghai, on April 25, there assembled a unique though unsensational gathering of men and women, whose deliberations and will have a far-reaching effect on estinies of the human race and the y of the world. It was the Centennial Missionconference, which marks the hundredth anniversary he landing in China of Dr. Robert Morrison, the missionary to the Celestial Empire. At a recepreliminary to commencing its labors, some 1,500 le were present, representing eighty-three different ties and agencies, working ore than 500 Chinese cities. varying organizations bethem, they are united in ndeavor to bring enlightento 400,000,000 fellow tures.

ne names of those on the form have become housewords for scholarship and tion to duty. As I watched throng my thoughts reverted hose other religious assem-, conclaves and covenants throughout the ages of the whose work has left such ndelible impression on man-. This conference began to e history with almost its breath. Throughout the century the missionary in a has labored without any gnition from the Chinese rnment and its officials save enforced by treaty. He been barely tolerated, often reated, sometimes massa-, and generally regarded as isance and a pariah. Now e troubles have been swept into the limbo of forgotten forgiven things.

n the platform, the one spot color in the otherwise sombrely dressed throng, a Chinese mandarin—his Excellency Taotai Y. C. g, ex-student of Columbia University and personal esentative of the great Viceroy Tuan Fang, who uler over a country half the size of Europe and 00,000 people. This accomplished official had been gated to extend a welcome to the Conference on behalf of the Chinese government. Speaking in English with but the slightest suspicion of an accent, the voice of the speaker rang through the breathless audience: "Our welcome is sincere, and is tendered in the spirit which animates all men desirous of achieving some good in the world, of whatever creed they may be, or to whichever branch of the great human family they may belong." The official cachet was thus placed on the terrific labors of a century. China had at last welcomed the missionary.

Delegates Leaving the Building After the Conference

With the enthusiasm born of such a propitious commencement, the Conference opened its sessions and proceeded to discuss the greatest question—the union of the church in China. The fact that some eighty-three different Protestant societies have been working independently of each other in China during the past has been a source of weakness in more ways than one, but especially as regards the intelligent and intellectual classes of Chinese, who possess a great faculty of logic. They had had eighty-four different ways to heaven pointed out to them. One of these was that of the united Roman Catholic Church; the others were those of the disunited Protestant communions and sects. The unification of so many interests was obviously a very difficult matter, requiring the exercise of all the diplomacy of the leading spirits amongst the assembly. A series of resolutions were submitted which, it was thought, would meet the wishes of everybody. Unfortunately, one denomination, which has some considerable claim to be represented on all such committees, but which was not on this special committee, took exception to such treatment, and the result was a heated debate, which at one time threatened to break up the Conference. Eventually a common ground of agreement was found and the assembly made its confession of faith in the following words: "This Conference unanimously holds the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the supreme standard of faith and practice, and holds firmly the primitive apostolic faith. Further, while acknowledging the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed as substantially expressing the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, the Conference does not adopt any creed as a basis of church unity." The resolution was passed amid the singing of the Doxology, and the United Protestant Church of China was founded.

What struck me most about the whole incident was the possibilities such an action contains. If it is

Salt Without Savor

TEXT: Matthew 5: 13

"Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost its savor, it is thenceforth good for nothing"

WHENEVER you hear a word that strikes or wounds you, you should ask yourself, was this an untrue, unjustifiable word? Or was it one of those words justified by my own conduct? Was it a word provoked and merited by the religious world, false in some of its aspects, but having a real foundation?

Let each of us begin by considering the facts. Some illustrious examples suggest such self-examination. Behold one of them drawn from the Old Testament: King David was fleeing from a rebellion incited by his own son. He was surrounded by his court, when there approached a man of evil countenance. In the midst of the men by whom his majesty was surrounded, this face was a blemish. This man not only had the courage to utter horrible abuse against the king, but he cast stones at him. Then the captain Abishai said to David: "Why does this dead dog curse the king? Let me go over, I pray thee, and cut off his head." But the king said: "Let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David!" (II. Sam. 16: 10.)

Need of Self-examination

David, in the depths of his heart, could without difficulty recall some memory to justify the stones and the malediction. He interpreted in the most indulgent sense the disrespectful act of his assailant, and meekly bore the abuse and the stones cast with malignant hate. Shall we not do as he did? A large stone has fallen into the religious garden. Shall we begin to anathematize and curse? To what good? It would be better for us to ask ourselves if it might not be the Lord who had inspired someone to cast this stone to arouse our consciences. Have we not merited it? When I say we, I speak of all those who make a profession of religion. I address myself with an ecumenical spirit, as one of that great throng. Allow me to speak to you apart from your denominational names, whether you are Jews, Catholics or Protestants, and not the sincere members of a special church.

If you love religion, it evidently should cause you pain that there should be men who rate it a bad weed which should be pulled up. But instead of retorting would it not be better to give yourself to a severe and conscientious examination of your conduct? Think: Has it not sometimes happened in the world that religion was a useless or evil power? Do you not recall those epochs when, deprived of life, it had no longer any connection with God by inspiration, nor with men by kindness? Senile, chilly, selfish, it wished only one thing—to remain there. From fear of dying, it employed bad means to maintain its life. It would have willingly sacrificed the young rising forces of thought in order to prolong its old age.

Then recall that at other times religion has appeared to us as allied to the powers of this world, even to have connection with usurpers. It sang the Te Deum gladly on the day after the enactment of some unexpected state measure, the bells were rung to celebrate the victory of tyrants. It has ascribed to God some deeds which certainly did not elevate him, nor inspire the respectful and holy conception which we should have of him! Men have placed God on the side of the strong who could dispense with his aid, and against the feeble who had need of his protection.

Some have carried the blasphemy still further. Christ emphatically declared that one could not serve God and mammon, and thus emphasized the difference between the life for God, broad, disinterested, luminous, and the life for mammon, suspicious, grasping, jealous. Men have dared state this horrible thing, to make of God the guardian of mammon.

Religion Perverted

Then others have dared to ascribe to religion another function, performed by a crafty old nurse, who appeases the too noisy nursling by dishonest means, or cheats his hunger and thirst by some mean delusions. Religious hopes have been presented to make a man have patience with iniquities that justice and natural good sense would have counseled him to combat. Religion has been made to pose as a wheedler of consciences, murmuring cradle songs which soothed to moral slumber men whose consciences protested against their crimes. It has been lowered to the rank of our over-compliant partner, skilful in throwing a mantle over all scandals.

In so many sad roles has religion been made to appear besides that of dividing good men among themselves, as if those of one creed were not brothers of those of another creed.

Let us confess this burlesque of religion contains some very contradictory things. It comprises some so reprehensible that all of us who love true religion should smite our breasts. For we belong to the family in which these things are done. Let us not elude responsibility. We worship God; we trust in Christ and the Gospel. If our life gives the lie to our beliefs, or if, though we may not have sullied religion ourselves, we refuse to repair the evil done by others, the story of the salt that loses its savor is the one which should be told us.

Who Are the Salt of the Earth

Hear the Master who proclaims fraternal but inflexible truths. They are his disciples who listen to him. He has before him those who receive the good message, aglow with the light, the color, and the air of the heavenly heights, the good news of high human destiny, of the incommensurable destiny of souls. He said to them: "Ye are the salt of the earth."

All those who understand the lesson of the stars—all those who feel that an Infinite throbs beyond the narrow limits of this world—all those who, in the winding of human affairs and their tortuous course, perceive a law, a mind, a superior essence—all those who see in the flowers of the field, in the face of a child, this beauty more gracious than all others, have a presentiment of an unknown grandeur, and hail the invisible concealed under the veil of visible things—all those who tremble before the beauty, the true grandeur of soul, and appreciate courage and self-denial—all those who feel that man is greater than he is able to perceive or think himself—all those are "the salt of the earth."

But this salt has savor; its quality is always revealed; it proves itself. Neither salt nor light can be concealed. A lamp which does not illumine is not a lamp, however beautiful and elegant it may be. A salt which does not salt is no longer salt.

Of what value is the religion of a man who, in ordinary life, is no better than another, and yet professes that he believes in God, and in this wonderful reality of religion which goes beyond all things? If God neither appears in his conduct, nor moves in his actions, this man is only salt without savor, a lamp without light.

Now, my brethren, this religion, like flat salt, not only exists, but it has always existed in greater proportion than the real religion. Good things are rare. It is on that account that those who sincerely love religion should reflect upon the judgment passed on those who profess religion by those outside. In short, why is it that men do not believe in religion and hate it? It is very simple: Religion is accused of availing itself of a belief in the future life to induce those who are disinherited of all good to resign themselves to the iniquities and miseries of this life. In truth and reality this reproach is without foundation, but applied to certain cases, it is merited.

Lack of Sympathy

Look at life, and look at men. Life is full of gloom, and men are wretched. Vicious, poor, scourged by all sorts of material necessities, the multitude is governed by obscure needs, burdened with suffering and privations. To this multitude, some professors of religion say: "Alas! it is so; one can change nothing. Nay more, the positive will of God is that it be thus. It is necessary to bow to it."

Those who speak in this way are most frequently in an exceptional position. Their lot is not that of the crowd. Ah! If I were shivering with cold, seated upon a stone, surrounded by my brothers who are shivering like me, I might say to them: "A better time will come; let us put up with this; let us not lose courage. All will be remedied; our tears will be wiped away," and I should be right. Nothing strengthens and consoles an unfortunate like a good word from another unfortunate. But if, dressed in a warm overcoat, going out to take a comfortable repast, I seat myself beside some miserable creatures, and do nothing more than say: "Do not complain; be patient; undoubtedly this poor world was destined to woe; but there will be a better: behold a good Book; behold the Gospel. Open it; you will see how Jesus speaks to you and promises you heaven." Oh! then, if the Eternal should appear living among men, he would take the Bible away from me, and would say to me: "Is that all that you offer? Is it thus you speak of me? Go, I do not know you; name me no more! You misrepresent me! The atheist who does not speak of me, but sits down b wretched man, and truly shares his griefs, and all tries to cure them, is a better man, more religious."

After all, my brethren, what have we to do in life? Is this life to man what the school-hour is t bad pupil—a time whose end he awaits impatie Is this life a kind of hall of purposeless wanderin which one kills time, while waiting for eternity? has presumed to tell us that religion teaches this sive and sterile resignation? Has not an irresis command of the religious conscience called upon u transform the earth, if it is wicked and bad? has told you that God's will cannot be done in hu society? then why does Christ pray, "Thy will be on earth as it is in heaven"? Who has told you justice could not be realized among men—that tress was a divine institution? Who has charged to spread such a doctrine in the name of the Cruc who died upon Calvary, that the name of God m fill the human soul?

Christianity a Religion for To-day

Worse than all atheisms is the religion which fesses to believe in God, yet thinks that this worl incorrigible and irreparable. That is equivalent saying that God is powerless among us; that he is in man, neither in our intelligence, nor our conscie nor in our hands; that his law is not inscribed in s things and the duty of every hour.

Christ, our Master, did not bring us a religion inert contemplation, but of action. His was no religion of pious memories which shut up in wonde caskets treasures of long ago, that are not now us among men. He had a religion for all time, addr ing himself not only to the conscience of his temporaries, but embracing things and condit which are not existing even yet. He had the faith moves mountains. Such a religion does not re itself to evil, it declares war against it. It does prostrate itself in mere platonic worship of the go it wishes that it may be, and strives to create it. labors, sows, forges and builds. It is creator, i word, and permeates the world as leaven does dough.

Christ made use of the names of prophets, wh spirit was like his own. Priests are too often ti guardians of the old traditions and of matters by-gone interest. Engaged in stopping the chinks sanctuaries to keep out the air, they apply themsel to preserving confined chambers that are the destr tion of those who persist in dwelling in them.

The prophets, on the contrary, are men of the f air and the living God. Often their creed is unwritt they have it in the heart. They do not seek for G in the parchments; they breathe him; they hail h in the light; they feel him upon the hills. Their G does not hypnotize the soul by resigned prostratio He works in their breast and fills them with coura They do not need to have him proved to them by texts covered with dust; they are lifted by his pow as the wing of birds is lifted by strong winds. think that there is no God, is an idea which would little come to them as to doubt the existence of lig or to cheat themselves with the thought that night not night, and day is not day. They live God, th cry him, shout him, sing him; they love him, and th love men unspeakably, with a love that passes t bounds of the earth, with a conquering love th passes beyond the highest which man dares to hope himself. As for Mammon, they do not mind hi for Mammon is the god of inferior concerns, of that the spirit arraigns and condemns, of all that w one day fall.

A Virile Faith

The prophet sees in himself the future City of Ju tice, and struggles to realize it. He bears his word one would bear a sword, to fight against evil, and protect the weak. He possesses nothing else, but i would not give it in exchange for all the goods of th earth, for it is his wealth, his power, his nobility an his happiness.

The voices of the prophets, at certain periods, a silent. In the days of Christ, what remained of tho ancient seers had become mere routine, a hackney word which slept in the dull ears of the Jews. Bu that which had become impotent and cold as black coa under dead cinders, sprang to new life in his sou Elias was rewakened in the heart of the Nazaren and 'ologies of the East and West. Beside them sat Bondfield, organizing secretary and smartest of business men. Lower down in the auditorium was Cassels, bishop and litterateur, dressed in his Chinese costume, to which he is so accustomed that the conventional garb of Western civilization has become a burden to him. By him sat Arnold Foster, the Congregational veteran, and a little further off Graves, Anglican bishop of Shanghai, whose statesmanlike work and diplomatic conduct led to the acceptance of the great resolution on union.

Another figure hurriedly entered the room and sat down on one of the lower benches. The ushers at that door were young men from America, and their piety had not destroyed their sense of humor or capacity for making a trite remark. One of them tapped the other on the shoulder and said in a semi-whisper, "That's a real, live, English lord." It was the Rev. Lord William Cecil, son of the late Marquis of Salisbury, prime minister of England, who, ten years ago, ordered the withdrawal of the British cruisers from Port Arthur and changed the fate and history of the Orient. And here in Shanghai, the gate of the East, after ten years of such history-making as few previous decades have ever witnessed, the reverend son of the statesman subsequently conversed upon creeds and customs with the representatives of a people whose entire destiny was changed by a stroke of his father's pen.

Not the least striking feature of all the gatherings was the entire absence of self-consciousness about them. There was no time nor opportunity or inclination to strain after meretricious effects or make-believes of importance. Facts, figures and business was the keynote of the Conference; but it was the personality of the delegates as a whole which spoke most eloquently for the reality of the work which has grown up so marvelously in the hundred years since Dr. Morrison landed in China. Their labors are already of record, their path now lies clear before them. The Protestant Church of China has been founded after much toil and sorrow. The missionary has at last been welcomed to the Celestial Empire by the controlling temporal powers of that vast country. Success is assured and the men who have fought for it and won it have the good wishes—in the words of the Chinese mandarin—of every thinking man "of whatever creed they may be, or to whichever branch of the great human family they may belong."

Among the notabilities whose portraits Captain Kirton has furnished, one of the most interesting is Rev. Lord William Cecil, son of the late Marquis of Salisbury, prime minister of Great Britain. Lord Cecil is a delegate of the China Emergency Mission Committee, and was present on the occasion of the reception given to the delegates to the Centennial Missionary Conference by the International Institute at Shanghai. Another interesting personality is Dr. Gilbert Reid, director-general of the International Institute; with him in the photograph are the taotai (prefect) of Shanghai and H. E. Lu Hai-huan, imperial commissioner of the Chinese government and president of the International Institute. Still another is the Rev. A. H. Smith, D.D., the American president of the Conference. He is a great student and the author of standard books on China. His works have been translated into every European language, also into Japanese and Chinese.

That the social amenities were not forgotten is shown by the photograph in which Mrs. Walter Kirton, wife of Captain Kirton, our soldier-correspondent, is seen entertaining delegates at tea on the grounds of the International Institute at Shanghai. This was during the reception to the Missionary Conference. Mrs. Kirton (seen in centre of the picture) is a native of Missouri. On her right is Miss Warr, a missionary who recently escaped massacre in Shansi, and who saw her friends murdered by the mob before her eyes. She was protected by a Chinese soldier. On the extreme left of the group is Taotai Chung, personal delegate of the great Viceroy Yuan Shi-kai, who is conversing with Lord William Cecil.

At these garden parties in the Institute grounds, opportunity was given to the Chinese community to express their acknowledgments to their missionary friends, and the most was made of the occasion in that direction. The grounds, which have lately been attractively laid out, were gaily decorated with Venetian masts lent by the French municipality and flags loaned by the American ships in port and hung by bluejackets. Director-General and Mrs. Gilbert Reid (who were assisted by the Rev. and Mrs. Perry) had also enlisted the services of some forty-two ladies to assist them as host and hostess. Twelve of the ladies and the members of the Institute Committee, with prominent Chinese gentlemen, received the guests as they arrived. The other ladies, two to each, presided at the fifteen tea tables disposed about the lawns, and made them additionally attractive by beautiful floral decorations.

MAY CHANGE A STATE'S CAPITAL

The Famous Berkeley Oak

The Spade Orator

Berkeley's Greek Amphitheatre

OVER the Golden State the idea has been gaining ground that the capital of California should be moved from Sacramento to Berkeley, which is better situated geographically, and has the facilities of San Francisco practically at its doors. The report gives added interest to this unique college town that may become the newest of the capitals in the Union.

Berkeley reminds one of the scholastic towns of Europe. The greater part of the city lives at present on the State University here. Down the middle of the main street electric cars with curious diamond-shaped trolleys resting directly on roofs make their way. That is all there is to indicate progress. The main street itself is lined with little stores. The bank is situated in a room built of brick in a frame structure.

The main stores are tall for two-story buildings. Two of them are of yellow stucco in the Mission style. Then there is one long one of white concrete in the Spanish style. Passing these and two green painted frame structures, you are about through with the civic side of Berkeley. It all lies on two long squares. All of the business done on these two squares is connected in some way with the university.

We Americans do not often get an opportunity to see just what that implies. The barber professes to be the "college barber." The haberdasher sells base ball bats, mits and pennants. In the other stores there are signs of the "half-hour of music to be held in the Greek Amphitheatre this afternoon at four," for a shop-keeper might as well close doors as refuse his windows to the students' posters. If it rains the concert will be in Hearst Hall, you note as you go on.

Some of the posters, by the way, are decidedly interesting and artistic. There is one, for example, of the "Maneuvres of Jane," that you actually covet. The affair is given for the benefit of the students' hospital fund. In this they are assisted by the Pyrtanean Society, the Mark and Dagger and the In-the-Meantime Clubs. Then there are other notices that interest the newcomer they smack so thoroughly of college life. Notices, for instance, of a symphony concert in the Greek Theatre. In the shops, too, the wares are not uninteresting. Magazines, post-cards and stationery are placed for sale, so over the doors you are apt to find a sign: "Who enters here leaves his cigar behind." You note the pretty favors and programmes and tallies, and you do not wonder at the prohibition. All of the shops, in fact, are artistic in their arrangement. Even the telegraph office, notably the candy stores, tempt one. In the latter there is a window bed of pink cloth, and rising from this, on plate glass shelves, there are glasses of imitation soda, the cotton on top for foam. The post-office is in the old Mission style at the head of the main street. Across the head of the thoroughfare a low fence is broken by the entrance to the grounds of the University of California. There is a botanic garden here, and beyond, a dense clump of blue gums. At Berkeley the buildings have been erected as the money was forthcoming, instead of by set plans as at Stanford, until two years ago, and the results in consequence are not nearly so pleasing. Passing through the gate you take a graveled walk bordered with ivy, up through the botanic garden, and there are oblong patches of different native grasses, and behind these different shrubs, pines and eucalyptus.

Two college girls come down the walk, hatless and happy, as they chatter of French and of German. Over the rustic bridge, over a creek, in a typical lovers' glen and then among the dense-set native trees, we continue on in the park, to where the roads divide to meet by curves at the campus. Over on the right are the homes of Berkeley; on the left are the famous old live oaks, noted for the queer spreading of their branches and their irregular contour. Beyond them, the football field, with its stands of seats, is visible. Where the campus widens stands a bronze statue of a man bandaging a football player's arm. This was the prize for football superiority won by the university in 1890-94. It is the work of Douglas Tilden, and the gift of John D. Phelan. Beyond is a large two-story gray frame structure on one side, and ahead, three large buildings at the foot of the mountains. On the other side another tall, white stone structure is set, with a brick edifice beside it. That, then, makes up the first prospect of the university. On the green hills, high above, a "C" of yellow concrete is cut, as the Turks used to cut crescents on their hills.

Beyond this is the Entomological Laboratory. An area of shrubbery stretches then to the rear of the campus, where a building in the old English style, with a handsome terra-cotta porch, overlooks the entire esta

It began to rain by this time, and we follow in the wake of the students and took refuge this porch, and while the rain swept down over t campus, and no sign of thing animate, save an oc sional passer bearing an umbrella, we engaged a pro "soph" in conversation.

He was well informed, and earned part of his tuiti as an inspector of buildings. The college term he s opened August 16, and recitations began practically once. On registration days, the sophomores assembl and went about among the freshmen standing sadly need of information, since t buildings are not named.

On these verdant innocents was a customary and favori trick to play, to send them be measured for some fool pu pose, or to pretend to be a pr fessor, and as all freshmen mu take gymnastics, order them report therefor at a certain plac There the mock professor a pears and orders them to answ his questions, and to be measure He reveals his identity, but onl after the measurements are a completed.

The girls of Berkeley manag to keep aloof from these co lege pranks, but the men mak up for it.

Of course, there is another sid to life at the college town. Th classes are about evenly divide between the sexes, and it i settled that classes of even nu merals shall have red, the other green, for their colors here. The college colors, blue and gold mingle to heighten the effect. In October the great football game between the freshmen o Berkeley and of Stanford is held, alternating between this place and Palo Alto.

DISCUSSING THE WORLD'S PEACE

Second Hague Conference and the Problems it is Now Considering—The Leaders in the Debate

In the ancient and picturesque thirteenth century castle of the Dutch capital known as the Ridderzaal ("the Hall of the Knights") the second Peace Conference is now assembled. Its sessions during the former Conference were held in the no less romantic Huis ten Bosch ("House in the Woods"), the villa in the Haagsche Forest; but as that edifice was found altogether too small for the accommodation of the assemblage, it was decided to hold this year's meeting in the bigger building, which affords ample room for the delegates of the forty-six governments participating in the present Conference. The Ridderzaal is a fine old pile of brick and stone, gloomy and somewhat forbidding as to its exterior, but modern and inviting within. It is in the centre of a group of other buildings, which, taken together, form the municipal fortress known as the Binnen Hof.

Admiral Chas. S. Sperry

There are several good hotels at The Hague, but one—the Hotel des Indes—has been prepared specially as quarters for the more prominent delegates. In it are domiciled the British, American, Japanese, Italian, Spanish, Brazilian and Chinese representatives. The rest are pretty evenly distributed among the other hostelries.

June 15 was announced as the opening day of the Conference. It was understood to be the purpose to follow, as closely as possible, the parliamentary order and methods of last year's assembly. Although there was much discussion among the delegates after their arrival, it was admitted that no definite programme had been arranged which would tie the Conference down to any particular line of work. As far as Holland is concerned, it simply plays the role of a genial host, and does not attempt to direct or even suggest a schedule of topics for consideration. Still, it is well understood that certain powers are prepared to bring up, at the proper time, those subjects which have been canvassed in every capital in Europe for months past.

One of the new and surprising developments of this year's Conference is the increased representation from the Western world. In the Ridderzaal, seats are now filled by delegates from no less than twenty-one North and South American and West Indian governments. Although, with the exception of the United States and Mexico, these Western delegates may not be viewed as an influential element in the Conference, still they are not to be left out of the reckoning, since their community of interests and responsibilities may be expected to hold them together as a parliamentary unit.

Russia's ambassador to France, M. Nelidoff, presides at the opening session and extends the imperial greeting of the Czar to the assembly, while Queen Wilhelmina's cordial welcome is given through her Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Van Goudrain. After the usual preliminary speeches and the appointment of five or six committees, the body of delegates will not assemble in the great hall for several days, the various committees doing their duty quietly in the mean time. It is at these committee meetings that the real work of the Conference will begin to unfold itself. That Russia has a plan is not doubted, although it may not appear until her representatives have done some adroit canvassing. Of course, all the committee meetings will be secret, and very little, if anything, will be allowed to reach the public in advance of what may be announced in the open sessions of the Conference, which will meet probably once, or at most twice a week, while this committee work continues. It should be remembered, too, that even the Conference is not likely to throw its doors open at any except a few of the regular meetings. Everything will be done in secret, as becomes the dignity and reserve of a body which represents all the big and little powers and potentates of the earth to-day, and which has, in a measure, the peace and happiness of the race in its hands. Still, to the average thoughtful mind, it must occur that the dignity and usefulness of the Conference would hardly be compromised by occasional open sessions, where topics of such world-wide interest are to be discussed.

Among the leading subjects that may be regarded as certain to receive some consideration, the foremost is that of disarmament. It was supposed that Great Britain would have taken the initiative in introducing this topic for discussion, in view of the fact that the Premier, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, is the author and advocate of a proposal for reducing expenditures. But Britain seems to have concluded that Germany might take offense if England's delegates introduced the subject. The original plan was to frame a simple proposition, reciting that the States represented in the Conference agree for a certain number of years to keep their naval and military expenditures down to the average of the same number of years preceding the agreement. Thus France, Germany, England, Russia, Japan and the United States would each bind themselves not to build a greater number of ships in the next five or ten years, nor to spend more on the army, the navy, or on general armament in that time, than they have built and spent in the last five or ten years.

As some of the powers named have been making expenditures for these purposes at high pressure for several years, the imposition of such a limitation would be meaningless. It would neither make for the world's peace nor for the lessening of the burdens of taxation that now bear so heavily on all classes. Hence, if any power should assume the task of introducing a reduction measure in the Conference, it will probably be a mere formal concession to the clamor of the philanthropists and peace-lovers. With Russia, Japan, Germany, England and France indifferent or antagonistic to any scheme of the kind, its success would seem to be practically impossible. Italy, it is believed, will follow England's lead in this matter either way. Senator Tittoni, Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs, has so instructed Italy's delegates to the Hague.

As to the part which Russia, the chief actor in the international peace drama, will play in the present Conference, there seems to be general uncertainty. It is known, however, that with respect to the question of armaments, the Czar maintains the position defined in his note of 1905, which opposed discussion of this topic and favored its elimination on the ground, as Russian diplomats explain, that it would simply lead to disagreement and possibly to a vital disturbance of harmony in the Conference. Russia favors slow advances by cautious, well considered steps, enlarging the scope and functions of the Hague tribunal and extending the powers of the International Commission of Investigation established two years ago. She wishes also that the various unsettled questions affecting maritime warfare, such as the right of asylum, coal supply, and the rights of neutrals, should be defined, and especially the question of contraband. An international prize court may be proposed to obviate the present difficulty in the way of harmonizing conflicting views now held by different governments on this particular subject.

Further, the Czar is reported to strongly favor improvements in the provisions of the present convention regarding the submission of disputes to arbitration. It is not improbable that the Russian delegates may present for consideration a new treaty to cover the desired change, so broad and comprehensive in its terms that it could be applied universally. Something, too, has been hinted of a purpose on the part of Russia to introduce a proposition to amend the rules of war, relative to the opening of hostilities, surprises, the rights of non-combatants, etc., but these are probably speculative.

Germany's role in the Conference is to a large extent identical with that of Russia and Austria. She regards limitation or disarmament as impracticable. She will, however, favor taking up the question of the inviolability of private property at sea. Little is known of the attitude of Japan, although the indications are that the Mikado's representatives will aid in furthering all desirable and practical measures that may arise. As to the South American republics, they may be expected to act unitedly on all points except the Drago doctrine, which forbids the collection of national obligations by armed force. Chili disagrees on this question, and she also opposes compulsory arbitration. As there is a provision in the rules of the Conference permitting the withdrawal of any power during the discussion, it is probable that some of the delegates may take advantage of this opportunity to remain absent from the meetings at certain stages of the proceedings.

The Dutch government has provided generously for the entertainment of the delegates, and the heavier work will be varied by receptions, excursions, etc. Queen Wilhelmina, the royal hostess, will give a state reception to the delegates at her palace at Het Loo some time in July.

A Contribution Withheld

SOME vigorous words are uttered by a Missouri banker, who has been sued by a Bible college of his State for withholding a contribution of five thousand dollars, which he agreed to make to its endowment fund. The banker says that his promise was contingent on the college raising fifty thousand dollars, and as the condition was not fulfilled, he is justified in withholding his gift. That is a valid and sufficient defense, but it would appear from his remarks that he had another reason for not giving the money. He contends that the college is heterodox, and like a university which he names, and of which he says the college is a mere annex, is "a hot-bed of infidelity."

This is a very serious charge and all the more serious because it is made by a man of known Christian character and standing, who himself frequently ministers from the pulpit. That any institution which is training men for the ministry should have such a character is very ominous, because, if it is true, it is touching the head and fount of religious teaching.

We naturally expect that the bill of particulars justifying this withering indictment of the college and university must comprise the charge of teaching atheism in some form. It would be rash to say that an institution is "a hot-bed of infidelity" if it is holding up Christ as the Saviour of men, the one and only hope of the world, the divine Teacher sent from God, the Way, the Truth and the Life. Yet those doctrines are the very essence of the teaching of that university. The gist of its offense, according to the vituperative banker, appears to be that its teaching about the Creation, the Garden of Eden, the Flood, and the miracle of Jonah and the whale differs from that of former times. It believes and teaches that the statements of the Bible on these and similar matters were not intended to be read as literal history, but as imagery like that of Ezekiel, Daniel and the Revelation. It is a question of interpretation and not of denial. This teaching is common and we hear it from men of eminence and usefulness. They are accused of trying to tear the Bible to pieces, but the charge has been disproved repeatedly. The men who preach these things hold every part of the Bible sacred and would not omit a word of it; but they discriminate between sacred history and sacred poetry, and put in one category the parts that some men put in the other, but unite with them in holding all as "profitable for instruction in righteousness."

Not in such matters does the foundation of our holy religion consist. The man who believes that the world was made in six days of twenty-four hours each, and the man who believes that the days were thousands or millions of years long, would give the same answer to the question, "What shall I do to be saved?" Both are our brothers in Christ and we err when we join the unthinking throng in hurling opprobrious names at either of them, or attempt to create a prejudice against them. The kingdom of Satan is strong and aggressive; let the followers of Christ, instead of quarreling with one another, ignore minor differences and join hand in hand to promote his cause and spread his Gospel in the world.

Is Profanity Increasing?

ONE is led to wonder whether there has not lately been an increase of license in the common speech of daily life and a letting down of good morals in the matter of obeying the Third Commandment. Possibly a good many people have been tending in their ordinary usage to make this land of ours such a place as Kipling describes when, in his poem on Mandalay, he makes the British soldier refer to the East as an Arcadia, "where there ain't no Ten Commandments." Children and young people are not taught to fear God and keep his commandments as once they were, and it is no unusual thing to find the son and daughter of a Christian family unable to repeat the text of the laws given to Moses and engraved on the two tables of stone.

If as a nation we are wandering from the old ways in one particular, we are in peril of doing so in others. If we break the Fourth Commandment, why should we observe the Third? Certainly, one hears on the streets and from the lips of pedestrians passing by-words and ejaculations that approach the line of blasphemy, while, if there be a quarrel between car-drivers and truckmen, or a jam at a crossing, or any disturbance anywhere causing annoyance and delay, the adjacent air breathes of fire and brimstone. Schoolboys take the name of God in vain in their play, and even girls, less prone to this peculiar sin, drop into phrases that savor of the profane. The time has come when we need to set a guard upon our lips. Old-fashioned and courtly gentlemen used to consider it shocking to swear in the presence of women, but that barrier, too, is down and the man out of temper, or simply profane from habit, forgets his manners and alludes to the devil and the devil's abode quite freely, not merely before women, but before little children.

In the interest of purity and cleanness of speech, we should set a guard upon our lips. It is within our power to restrain and control our language. Aside from its daring impiety, profanity greatly weakens speech. The effect of a statement is impaired when it is accompanied by extravagant and foolish hyperbole. Nothing can be added to a plain statement of fact or a picturesque bit of romance, in the way of florid exaggeration or profuse expletives, without detracting from its power to move and convince the listener.

Those who are charged with the education of the young, and especially fathers and mothers, should see to it that, by example and precept, they enforce the Third Commandment. Teachers should put much emphasis on this in schools. Young women, in their friendship with young men, should insist on purity of speech, and show unmistakably their distaste for profanity.

The Children

HE who has never had a happy childhood can never know in this life what it is to be truly happy, unless the great opportunity is given him to make other children so. It is the "cry of the children" that wakes the quickest response in the human heart; it is childish sorrow that brings the tear to the eye of the most hardened. If the children are well provided for, their future will most probably take care of itself; so more and more efforts are being made to reach those who have been born in adversity, whose surroundings are unhealthful, and who have had no opportunity to enjoy the pleasures that come as a matter of course to the children of the well-to-do.

Our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn is a good example of the growing love for children, a love that has turned itself into deeds instead of words. In a few days it will throw open its doors to receive two thousand children gathered from the tenements and the slums. They will breathe fresh country air; they will see the great arch of the blue sky, which they had grown to think of as a narrow thread of light between the tops of high brick walls; they will roll upon the grass, and no blue-coated policeman will tell them roughly to "move on." Many of them will be for the first time truly happy in the "Paradise of the Children."

In New York there has been filed a remarkable will, made for the benefit of children, one that must have given the testator, James Morris, great pleasure in the making. It leaves $18,000 "to augment the sum of $2,000 heretofore given by myself and wife, making $20,000, the interest of which is to be devoted to provide perpetually for rides for invalid children." Another clause sets aside a large sum, the interest of which is to provide the services of a voice to sing the praises of God in the children's ward of St. Luke's Hospital.

For several years the little invalids have been enjoying the rides, their physical pains forgotten for the time, and now the numbers will increase each year, an endless chain of happy hearts and improving health. The culmination of this beautiful philanthropy is the last clause. It was formerly the custom to leave money to have prayers said for the benefit of one's own soul. Now, money is left that it may benefit the bodies and souls of others still living. It is a welcome change, and more closely follows the example of the Divine Friend of the children, who loved them so tenderly, and who pointed to the innocent heart of a child as an example to his followers throughout the world.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, New York City.

DEAR SIR: I have just spent several days in the famine region, and have seen the splendid work which is being done through the instrumentality of your paper, and wish to thank you in behalf of the hungry multitude that is being fed. I have never seen such conditions and so much suffering.

When I reach New York I shall see you personally.

Yours sincerely,

The Outlook at The Hague

OVER forty governments are represented in the second International Peace Conference, now in session at Queen Wilhelmina's capital. This is a great advance over last year, and is due to the active interest the Western republics, large and small, are taking in the peace movement. Practically all the world is now represented in the Hague assemblage, which began its work most auspiciously on June 15.

Fortunately for the prospects of harmony in the deliberations, general international conditions are, in the main, pacific. All the great Powers have their swords in sheath. Japan is busied with her budget and questions of trade expansion, and her relations with other governments are apparently amicable. Britain, Germany, France and the United States are all interested in their home and colonial affairs. It is true there is a hint of trouble between Mexico and Guatemala, and the Sultan of Turkey is confronted by the periodical revolt among his Arabian subjects; but these are incidents merely. It is a time of comparative rest for the Powers with the big armies, the great fleets and the massive guns.

But although all signs look propitious at The Hague, it would be well for peace-lovers not to expect too much of the Conference. It is a gigantic parliamentary engine, still new and untested, and the wheels revolve very slowly. As the Powers are wary and jealous, the great peace game cannot be other than experimental and tentative. In the sessions, which are largely secret, there will be many verbal passages-at-arms between the skilful diplomatists, over limitation or reduction of armament, the rights of neutrals at sea, contraband and non-contraband and the collection of one nation's debts to another by armed force. Much time, too, will probably be spent on revising the rules of war. There will be a great deal of futile discussion of which the outside world will hear little or nothing.

If, out of all this turmoil, there should come some result which can be regarded as a substantial gain for the world's peace, we shall be sincerely thankful. Two things are essential, and unless the Hague Conference accomplishes these, it will have failed, no matter how brilliant the speeches, nor how gratifying to the potentates themselves the general outcome may be. The two things are—a general Arbitration Treaty and the organization of a permanent Tribunal of Arbitration and Appeal, to which may be referred all quarrels that are incapable of adjustment between the disputants themselves. Let us hope that the expectation may be realized and that the Conference will earn the gratitude of the progressive, intelligent, peace-loving people of all lands.

Eskimos of Alaska

AMONG the mementoes of Captain Amundsen's sojourn in the Arctic, not the least interesting are the photographs of Eskimo life and the portraits of their chief men and especially their most omely women. They are not beautiful according to outhern taste, but to the explorer in the region of ice nd snow their faces were very welcome, for they speak f the help that they alone could give. The advances ward the Pole made in recent years would never have en possible without their aid. Amundsen agrees with eary in acknowledging indebtedness to them. During e three years he spent in verifying his discoveries, he as in constant touch with the true Eskimos and the Innuits hom he found in the extreme north. He tells of the terest he felt in visiting one of their villages. He met e Eskimos on the pack ice off the east coast of King illiam Land. They were very friendly and invited the xplorer to return with them. It took them two hours reach the village, which consisted of sixteen houses. n Innuit house is a mound of earth in the summer and mound of snow in winter, oval or circular, with a hole the apex for the smoke to et out. The entrance is by a w passage ten or twelve feet length. In the living room here is a fire on the floor imediately under the smoke ole. A low platform runs long the wall covered with ats or skins, which serves s a seat by day and a bed at ight.

The women, he says, appeared to be surprised by the isit, and to be somewhat hy. Only three of the oldest ad ever seen white men bere. One of these seemed to ave reassured the others, for resently they returned under er guidance, and as they filed n each uttered a peculiar runt, which was understood to e an expression of welcome. hey were all attired in their est clothes, which were made ut of reindeer skins. They, ith their husbands and brothrs, paid a return visit to mundsen's ship, the Gjoa, and tayed for some time, hunting nd fishing for the crew. mundsen says they were deighted with some inexpensive presents, the most aceptable being the empty tin ans in which the explorer's food had been brought.

They proved to be a shrewd, good-humored people, simple in life and habits, and not so immoral as some travelers have represented. They have huge appetites, and consume large quantities of seal-flesh, walrus, etc. Their services to the explorers are invaluable, both in obtaining food and in transportation. They are skilled hunters and fishermen, having been driven to those pursuits by natural conditions, for their country cannot be cultivated. The few berries and roots it produces are of little value. The most essential service they can render is by their dog teams, which they know how to manage and drive to the wonder of the white man. These dogs draw heavy sleighs for long distances and are able to travel over the roughest ice. Little has been done for the Eskimos from a moral or religious point of view. The Moravians have established stations at widely separated points, and with heroic perseverance have labored among them, in loving patience, amid much discouragement. The little the Eskimo knows of religion, he owes to these brave, self-denying Moravian missionaries, who have devoted their lives to preaching to them and teaching them.

Ye shall be witnesses unto me unto the uttermost parts of the earth. (Acts 1 : 8.)

Captain Amundsen's Photograph of Eskimo Ladies of Alaska

A Baron's Apprenticeship

A journal of Joplin, Mo., announces a marriage in that city which is the culmination of a romance of international connections. A citizen of Joplin who is the consulting engineer of companies in the Missouri-Kansas mineral district, with extensive interests in productive lead and zinc mines, went to Europe two years ago, taking his daughter with him. During their stay in the European capitals they met a young German baron whose ancestors had been conspicuous in Polish history. He became enamored of the young American lady, and after traveling around with her and her father for some weeks he proposed marriage. The father was naturally concerned about the character of the young man. Not as to his noble standing in Germany, but as to his personal qualities. He hesitated for some time about approving his suit. Finally he made it a condition of giving his consent that the baron should return to America and work for a year as an ordinary spade hand in the mines. The young man was so much in love that he consented. He donned the overalls and went down with the other men, sharing their hardships and perils and presenting himself on pay day for his pay, at the same rate as the others. He made himself popular with the men and with the overseers and is said to have done good work. He served a year and then claimed his bride. The wedding ceremony is said to have brought together more wearers of famous titles than Joplin ever saw before. The baron had proved himself worthy of his bride by showing what he could endure for her sake. It is such love, the love that could bear humiliation and hardship and suffering, that Christ had for his people.

Made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. (Phil. 2: 7.)

A Steeple-Climber's Peril

A man famous for his courage in climbing to dizzy heights came near losing his life at Utica, N. Y., a few days ago. He was doing some repairs near to the summit of the spire of Westminster Church, when he felt in the rope by which he was suspended, the peculiar thrill which men of his profession know to be the omen of approaching trouble. He had just time to reach out one hand and grasp the safety line and hang on, when the rope he had been using parted. Some enemy had soaked it with acid at that part which would be at the apex of the spire when it was used. He signaled to his wife, who always accompanies him on his business trips and who was waiting below, that he was in trouble. In two minutes she saw a line of thin twine descending from her husband's hand. To this, when it reached her, she attached a new rope held in readiness for such emergencies, and her husband drew it up. He made it fast and descended safely to the ground. On examining the broken rope, he found that the "dope" had eaten through the manila, leaving it as rotten as sand. It was an awful discovery for that man to make at that dizzy height, that his rope was failing. There are men who have made an analogous discovery as they have stood on the brink of eternity. Those who are depending on their moral character, their large gifts or their church connection should lose no time in grasping the safety rope of Christ which can never fail.

I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. (II. Tim. 1: 12.)

A Night in a Jungle

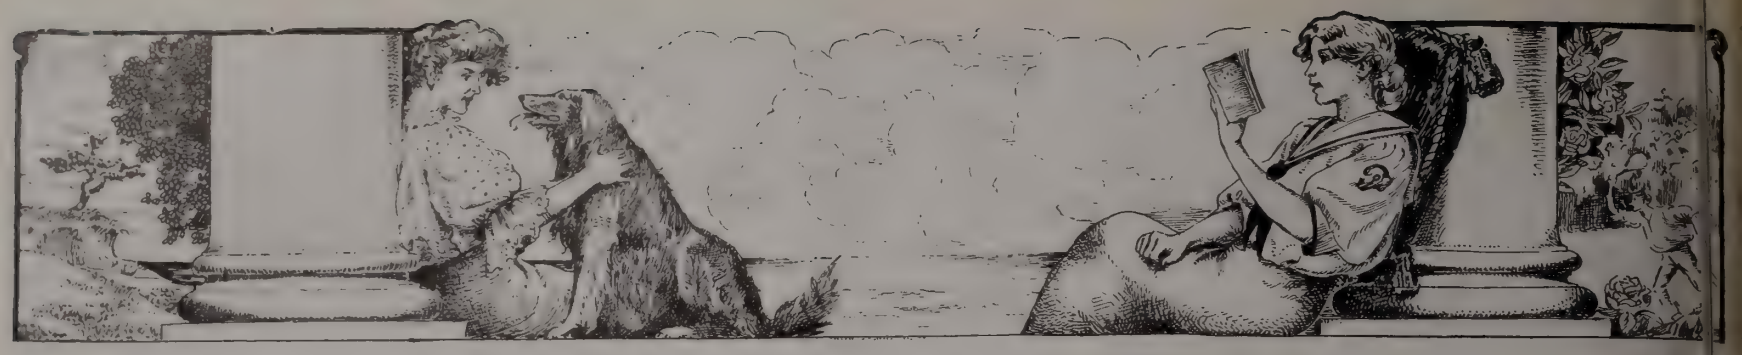
An American lady who has returned to Washington, D. C., after spending a year in India, gives a thrilling account of a night she passed alone in the jungle. She had gone into Hyderabad with some friends who were hunting big game. One day the hunters set out early and toward evening the American visitor went to meet them. In some way she missed the trail, and while she was searching for it or for the camp, the night suddenly fell, as it does in the tropics, and she was alone in the darkness, on the edge of the jungle. To make matters worse, the rain began falling heavily. She was paralyzed with fear as she thought of the panthers and still more of the snakes. Wet to the skin and afraid to move, she remained during the weary hours. To her joy she was unmolested. At daybreak one of the coolies, whom her friends had sent out to search for her, found her and guided her to the camp. Her friends told her that her greatest fear—that of snakes—had been unnecessary. They said that snakes keep under cover in wet weather, so that the rain, which had appeared to her a misfortune, had probably been the means of saving her life. So it often is in the spiritual realm. The things we fret against prove to be blessings in disguise.

No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness. (Heb. 12: 11.)

Conflicting Jurisdictions

The Supreme Court has been appealed to to settle a question of vital interest to every soldier. It concerned the case of an enlisted man in the army in the Philippines. The man was attacked by two natives, one of whom was armed. He shot them both. The question then arose whether he was justified in killing the unarmed man. A court martial was summoned which after hearing the evidence acquitted the soldier. But the civil authorities were not satisfied, so the soldier was tried by a civil court, which convicted him and sentenced him to twelve years' imprisonment. The question of jurisdiction was then raised and the case aroused so much interest and was of so much concern to soldiers everywhere, that a fund was raised in small sums contributed by thousands of soldiers, to carry the case to the highest court. Justice Harlan, of the Supreme Court of the United States, has now handed down the decision. He orders the soldier released from custody and reverses the decision of the civil court. It would appear from this decision that the soldier is henceforth amenable to military authority alone and the civil powers have no authority over him. Probably this applies only to his conduct on a military reservation. Happily for the public peace, the military powers are even more disposed than the civil to enforce good behavior on the part of the soldier. In any case, the soldier now knows that it is by the members of his own profession that he will be judged, and not by lawyers. The soldier of Christ has the same consolation: the world may judge him, but the only judgment he need care for is that of his Master.

Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth: yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. (Rom. 14: 4.)



LARGE OR SMALL FAMILIES?

By Margaret E. Sangster

WE cannot deny when we begin to discuss the question of the family that, as to numbers, there are favorable arguments to advance on both sides. The large family in which the children follow one another into the world in quick succession is apt to be genial and sympathetic, is likely to have abundant opportunity for self-denial on the part of every one, and for the jolliest of good times.

Living once as next-door neighbor to a household in which the children numbered sixteen brothers and sisters, from young people just reaching the grown-up stage to a baby in the cradle, and where the father and mother had barely touched the meridian of middle age, I had occasion to note with pleasure the absolute happiness of a large family. It was not unlike a republic in its division of labor, and in its responsibility and self-government. The older children, having been well started, set so good an example to the juniors that in the case of the latter there was little need of discipline, and the mother of the flock looked almost as young and quite as pretty as her eldest child. The people were not rich, and the mother had not handed her nursery over to the care of paid assistants, but the children had somehow helped to bring themselves and each other along the road in an admirable fashion that left nothing to desire.

I have in my possession the genealogy of an eminent New England family, with ramifications to-day over the country and the globe. The family dates back to early Colonial days, and looking over the pages of the record I find that the average number of children born in the homes of the earlier periods was twelve to fourteen. Boys and girls, sturdy and vigorous, crowded those old farm-houses, and, duly passing through the stages of childhood and youth, took a share in the moulding of what has become a mighty nation. The parents of those days appear to have expected large families as a matter of course, and to have carried their responsibility without so much agitation, fussing and fretting as are common in American homes to-day.

It is fair, however, to mention here that there is no apparent reluctance on the part of our wealthier people at this particular era to undertake the cares incidental to large families. The beautiful homes of the rich among us ring with the patter of children's feet, and are sweet with the melody of children's voices. It is the same in the tenement homes of the large cities, and in the mountain cabins of the South.

Extremes meet. The poor man hopes that his children will one day help him to bear the burdens of hard fortune. His richer brother takes delight and pride in the circle of little ones to whom he can give every earthly advantage, and who in time shall inherit all that comes to the heir of the golden spoon.

The immense contingent of thrifty people who fight a life-long battle with narrow means, who wish to live in comfort and in some degree of elegance, to educate children well and to give them a better start than their parents had, are those who believe in limiting the size of the family.

It must be admitted, too, that a woman who does her own housework, attends to some social claims, has a share in church work and personally assumes the making and mending for her brood, is seldom physically fitted to bear children rapidly. Unless she has a sufficient interval of resting between the arrivals of her children, the exhaustion of maternity will wear her out and she will leave her little children motherless. No sight on earth is sadder than that of a little cluster of heads close together without a mother's guardianship; the tired mother of the little untended brood asleep in her grave.

Those who advocate the small family affirm, with a good deal of reason, that they can do better for each child as it enters the home, if they are able to concentrate upon it their thoughts and their money. They assert that they can hover over infancy in accordance with the latest discoveries of hygiene, and that, from kindergarten to college, they can surround their children with an atmosphere of culture and encompass them with all that modern science suggests, while their own freedom from anxiety about ways and means will enable them to make their children happier and to be happier themselves.

I do not attempt to strike a balance in favor either of the large or of the small family. That I will leave to the judgment of the reader. It will be interesting to many to ascertain the views of readers of this paper based on their own experience. Mothers particularly have a right to speak in no uncertain tones on the subject that most nearly touches them.

I read the other day the most suggestive book for girls that has appeared since Miss Alcott published Little Women. The title of the book, A Daughter of the Hills, by M. E. Waller, fails to convey an idea of the striking qualities of a most fascinating story. The scene and background of the story are in a mountain fastness of New Hampshire, in a home where parents of culture and piety, encumbered by poverty, are successfully bringing up a houseful of delightful boys and girls. A city physician persuades the father of an only daughter to send his delicate darling out of the enervating environment of a millionaire's home that is motherless into the sweetness and motherly brooding of the home on the mountainside. The little girl is introduced to strangers, who at once become her friends, and in the novel situation, without a single luxury, but much homely comfort, she gains the health and strength that wealth could not give her. I have it in my heart to wish that this book might have the vogue that Little Women had. The simple, beautiful story is worth a thousand sermons and treatises on the best way of rearing and training a family.

WISELY CARED FOR

As the little chicks are cared for, by a wisdom not their own,
So we children of the Father get our blessings from the throne.
We, too, take, in sweet dependence, manna from a loving hand;
We, too, need not fear disturbance, guarded from the heavenly land.

Grumbling at the Weather

The remarkably cold and shiverit spring that gave us November breez in May, and kept our furnace fir going weeks after the usual time f dispensing with them, has afford temptation to chronic grumblers t find fault with the weather. No the weather is the one thing wit which no mortal may meddle. W may watch it, we may signal the ap proaches of storms and note wha goes on in upper currents of the a and in the atmosphere near th earth's surface; we may speak ou minds on the subject, regret that i is too hot, too cold, too wet, or to dry, but our doing this changes noth ing. We have only to read in th book of Job to ascertain that from the ancient day Jehovah himself sent forth the winds at his pleasure and guided the stars in their courses. How futile i seems and how childish to waste precious time and lose our tempers over the weather that, after all, is so managed that the world's work proceeds, on the whole without much interruption. Nothwithstanding the reluctant spring, the naked trees were clothed with ver dure as they always are in May; June came laughing in with her roses, and daisies spread a cloth of gold at the appointed time on hill-slope and meadow; birds sang, bees hummed, wavelets danced and the earth rejoiced beneath the good hand of God. Shame on grumbling; while "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world" iel spoke to him by night. Daniel, among the lions, e to him of the power of treading upon serpents, meeting all the forces of the world without fear. s, poor, he went to the poor; suffering, he went to suffering. He did not preach any distant or metasical God, any kingdom of the skies vaguely postnous, but a God near at hand radiating in him a ne kingdom of which he said: "It is at hand; it is ou; the strong force an entrance into it." He kinl his contemporaries, he touched them with an irreible power.

SALT WITHOUT SAVOR

nd we say that we are his disciples, my brethren! hat are we doing to show ourselves the disciples of n a Being? He had the faith that moves mountis; our beliefs are so miserable that they have not n the power to raise ourselves. They are no longer the nature of this force which is beyond all the es and which St. Paul referred to when he called the pel the power of God. The salt has lost its savor. n find it on the ground and they trample on it.

The lesson is hard. To profit by it, it is necessary be very simple and very sincere. Things that are longer used become useless. A doctrine must rule life. It should not take the position of an idle g, who does not govern; it must remain in force; cannot be inoperative. In the world of the spirit, does not live upon interest of former investments. ere must be daily striving. We must pray, "Give this day our daily bread." There are some people om religion no longer nourishes, but they value it being useful to others—the people, they say, need religion; it will calm them, make them contented d do them good.

The Real Danger

My brethren, such situations call for the searing n. I know the dangers of the time and I am not raid that the heavens will fall, nor that God can be ppressed, because some men do not make an outward ofession of religion, nor learn the catechism any nger. But I do fear that religious men who are not truth religious, and do not live their faith, may disnor religion because their faith is dead.

There is a vulgar and profane atheism, impious in its sence. It is the atheism of fast livers, of unrighteous ings, soiled by crimes; an atheism of night birds, of angerous evil-doers. This atheism has existed since en have been unbelievers, hugging to their hearts the elief that there is no invisible witness that sees and udges. But there is another kind of atheism abroad in he world. It is that which consists in rejecting a ivinity that does not control the human conscience. hat is a serious symptom which requires us to examine ur own conscience. When the stars have run their ourse they set; and history is full of examples of ivinities that have been held in reverence and are now unk in twilight. Let us beware of representing God s a being unsympathetic, dwelling above the clouds ike ancient Jupiter in splendor and perpetual joy; a God always happy; a God of the satisfied, of the conquerors, of the powerful, of the successful; a God of those who sleep upon their laurels. Such a conception of God is going down towards the horison of night.

There is another conception of God for us, a conception whose dawn has already come. This conception is that which Christ has announced to us: the God who as man, walks with men, and exerts without ceasing his invisible power by visible proof. It is the God who weeps with us, suffers with our human griefs, who bears upon him the rags which cover the shivering poor, and pities the little children "whose hands are reddened by cold." It is the God who, in the black night when it lies heavy upon the great capitals, is with those who live in fireless garrets, or in despair hurl themselves into the waters, rather than with those who pretend to love him among the bright chandeliers shining in the chapels that abut on dance halls.

God is Where Men Need Him

I think that our God is where one has need of him, and where there is something to do. He is not like those men who arrive when the need is past. He is one who loves the seekers and he delights in the society of all who work or labor hopefully.

As the sun, appearing in the splendors of the east, chases the shadows, dissipates the night and outshines the stars, our God disowns all the divinities that men have set up in his place—the tyrant gods, the comfortable gods, the avaricious gods, the sectarian gods, the gods of anathema, the gods of scorn. When the watcher in the night feels a strong, fresh breeze blowing he hails it as the forerunner of dawn, so our God causes to pass before him a wind of negation which sweeps the atmosphere. He sends before his triumphal chariot iconoclastic warriors who make clear space for him and prepare his way. There are some faces he does not wish to see; he makes them disappear before showing himself.

This is why we need not be astonished or afraid of what passes to-day. The chief point is to be on the side of the rising sun. Let us be children of the day and not children of the night.

If you love the cherished dead, generous combatants who rest in the tomb; if you love the vanished looks and all the stilled hearts reposing in mystery; if you love the little children who await the future, asleep in their cradles; if you love humanity, your old mother, brave and hard-working, who never loses hope, but busies herself specially with the poorest children, the weakest, the most friendless, then do not fear because stones are cast at false gods. Set yourself to work with the brave people who undertake necessary and righteous labors. When you see men of noble soul, of upright conscience, keeping the faith, who, in spite of past defeats, have still the courage to struggle against evil and wretchedness, to work to realize more justice, kindness and brotherhood, join their phalanx. Then, even if they have not your creed, be broad, work with those who work and let the dead bury their dead!

The days have returned when, passing through the ranks of men, Christ, that divine laborer appointed to cultivate the lands of the Eternal, would find better ground in the publican and in people of evil life, than in the proud Pharisee. The days have come when we should prostrate ourselves before the message of the Master announcing the judgment seat where we shall all be judged, where will be weighed in the infallible balance the wisdom of the wise, of the politicians, and the religion of religious people. That which alone will count in that day will be this: "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me." The same who said: As ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me," addresses this message to us to-day: "I am he who is with the bruised souls, with all those who are oppressed and suffer. I am he who lies down on the couches with the sick, in the tombs with those who die. I shiver with those who are cold, and when the people lack necessaries I am hungry."

The Criterion of Religion

Behold at what criterion we must value religion. Let us not search for it behind the mysterious mountains, or behind the pale stars. Let us search the profoundest depths of the human soul, of the conscience, and of life; let us look for God in the realities near by, for he passes among us.

God passes every day upon the streets and the highways; he follows the poor coffins that go away alone through the outskirts; he places wreaths where there are none; he is in the solitary places; he is wherever someone hopes and braces himself in order not to surrender before difficulties. He is in all brave hearts; he speaks all tongues; he travels all routes. Recognize his action and his presence in every effort persevering towards a better humanity.

All your catechisms are nothing. Your creeds are hollow. Your religion is only a nut whose shell alone remains; a bank which has no more gold ingots in its vault, if behind the names of God, of Christ, of the Apostles, of the Gospel, of the Bible; behind your formulas and your precepts, you can no longer show us the justification of the doctrines by the life.

The great attribute of God that we ought to worship is life. He is the living God. Let us be then disciples of the living God, and watch our salt that it shall not lose its savor! Then we shall have nothing to fear. That one who is all in all, who renews every morning; who restores the dawn after midnight, spring after winter, will be in our hearts and among us, and by his power we shall make the deserts bloom again.

A CHRISTIAN WORKER HONORED

WHEN some strenuous worker in the field of philanthropy is suddenly "commanded" to visit the king of England, in order to receive royal recognition of the worth of self-sacrificing effort for humanity, all the nation awakes to pay homage to the person thus honored. The latest instance of this kind is the knighting of Mr. John Kirk, who recently completed forty years' unceasing endeavor to ameliorate the lot of the unfortunate slum children of London. King Edward conferred on Mr. Kirk the rank and title of knighthood, so that he will henceforth be known as Sir John Kirk, while his wife will be Lady Kirk. This titular rank is not hereditary.

Mr. Kirk has become famous as the secretary of the Ragged School Union. After years of marvelous devotion, honors are now crowding upon him. At the London Mansion House he has been presented by the Marquis of Northampton with a portrait of himself, painted by William Rainey, together with other handsome gifts subscribed for throughout the United Kingdom. The Lord Mayor of London, Sir William Treloar, arranged a special gathering of distinguished men to meet the man who has won such widespread esteem.

Sir William Treloar is himself a philanthropist in the same field in which Mr. Kirk has labored. He is known and loved as the "Crippled Children's Lord Mayor," on account of his munificent gifts through long years for the benefit of the most forlorn class of city juveniles. Surely this deserves to be called "The Golden Era for Childhood." Education and philanthropy combine to give opportunities to childhood unthought of till now.

John Kirk became a philanthropist in a peculiar way. He started in life as a clerk in the office of the Pure Literature Society. That institution itself had a romantic origin, for it was inaugurated by a wonderful man, Rob Roy MacGregor, famous both as traveler and writer. During young Kirk's clerkship he spent his evenings voluntarily in aiding the work of a ragged school in South London. This proved to be the turning-point in his career. He became convinced that, to do effectual and lasting good to those little victims of misfortune and of sin, wholesome recreation was as much needed as sound education. He showed his power of initiative by starting on his own account little social clubs in connection with the school.

Sir John Kirk

The newly knighted philanthropist

His zeal soon met with its reward, for Rob Roy MacGregor invited him to accept the position of Assistant Secretary of the Ragged School Union. He accepted the offer and for twenty-five years worked assiduously. In 1867 he was promoted to the chief secretaryship of the Union, and has held the position ever since, just completing his fortieth year in that capacity. At one time the Ragged School Union had as many as 200 schools under its wing.

The Ragged School Union was the first organization that planned the sending of batches of emigrant children to new and far distant lands. The Union sent out destitute boys to Australia, the first party going out in 1845. Since then numerous contingents of rescued waifs have been first taught in the schools and then sent forth, for the triple benefit of themselves, of the young colonies, and of the mother country.

Mr. Kirk has more than once visited America. His daughter Hilda is in the United States, being happily married there. Two other daughters have for years been doing most useful public work in London. Mr. Kirk has four sons, two of whom have traveled far and wide in the world. Mr. Kirk is just attaining his sixtieth year. He is a native of Leicestershire.

REV. WILLIAM DURBAN.

London, England.

This is the story of the knighting of Mr. Kirk as a London paper relates it:

"He received from Buckingham Palace a communication as follows:—'His Majesty has been pleased to signify his desire personally to congratulate Mr. John Kirk upon the completion of his forty years' work for the Ragged School Union.'

"On the day appointed for the audience, he set out for Lennox Gardens, where he met Lord Northampton, who was to introduce him to the king. Together they drove to Buckingham Palace, where they were shown into one of the king's working-rooms. A few minutes later they were summoned to the royal presence.

"With a warm handshake, the king put his visitor at ease, and expressed his appreciation of the Ragged School Union. 'It is just ten years ago since I first met you at a dinner at the People's Palace,' he said; 'neither has the queen forgotten you.'

"After some further conversation on Mr. Kirk's work for the poor, the king called for a sword. 'To show my appreciation of your good work I wish to make you a knight,' he said to the philanthropist. Mr. Kirk demurred, but the sword was brought and he was commanded to kneel. A light touch on the shoulder with the shining blade and the king said: 'Rise, Sir John!' The astonished man rose to his feet and received the congratulations of his king, and then quietly withdrew."

Christianity an Abstinence Religion

*Sunday School Quarterly Temperance Lesson

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE should abstain for our neighbor's sake and for our own, but first and most of all for God's sake, the two great commandments, which are really three, constitute the supreme charter of temperance work. Will any one dare to say he can drink intoxicating poison as a beverage to the glory of God? But we are each under orders to "do all to the glory of God." Does any one question whether if all use of intoxicating beverages was abolished religion would be stronger and sins fewer? If it is the case, ours is "a total abstinence religion." Surely no one can love God supremely, and at the same time help by selling or buying intoxicating beverages to keep men from God, or draw men from God!

Abstain for the sake of your neighbor. That means, first of all, for the sake of your own wife and children. Here is a story told of a farmer's wife who went to meet her husband in the dusk at an appointed fence corner, and seeing what she took to be her husband on the other side of the fence, handed her baby to a bear, which swiftly bore it away to the mountains never to be seen again. That man hands his child over to a more cruel beast, who, by his drinking example, leads his child to become a drunkard.

A Wife's Allowance

Many years ago there resided in Manchester, England, a young calico printer, a capital worker, and a most obliging man, but unhappily addicted to drink. John, however, got married, much to the thankfulness of his friends, who hoped that through his young wife he might reform. Shortly after their wedding John said to Mary: "You're a sober woman, and so I mean to be a sober man; we must agree to take no more, each of us, than one pint of ale per day." With a serious face Mary queried gently: "Where shall you drink it, John? Except Sundays, you don't return home till late." "Of course in the factory—for your share, I will give you six cents a day, and you can drink it where you please." Months elapsed, during which John was unable to limit himself to his "one pint." At length came round the young couple's marriage anniversary. "Now, my dear, we've not had a single holiday since we were wed; let us have one to-day!" "With all my heart, girl!" he responded; "and if only I had a spare shilling or two in the world—that public-house is ruining me, to be plain, wifie — we might take a jaunt to the village, and see your mother." "I will stand treat, John!" said Mary. "You! you!" cried the amazed husband; "have you got a windfall of a fortune, and I never heard of it?" "I have just had the money for my pint of beer," smiled Mary, joyfully. "Your what?" "My pint of beer," she repeated, producing an old stocking which had served for purse, and from which immediately clinked out upon the tablecloth three hundred coins. "And you have not once tasted it, Mary!" he stuttered with a flood of tears; "then I never, never will again." "By God's grace, dear John," added the young wife softly (for she was a true Christian), and gathering up the stocking's contents, she handed him $21.90. A memorable day it proved indeed, the day which fixed the turning-point of John's hitherto wasted life. "By God's grace" he did most faithfully keep his vow and he prospered.

Beautiful Victims

What a host of moral perils assail our boys and young men to-day! Shall we make them greater by our example or by failing to smash the trap, so far as we can, that threatens their feet? One writer has thus pictured the perils of youth: One day I was in a wood watching a dove preening its pretty wings on a beech bough. It looked the picture of security. I had no thought that a bloodthirsty eye was fixed upon that dove; but all of a sudden there was a whirring sound, a short scuffle and a piteous outcry, and I saw that a sparrow-hawk had seized it in its talons and was bearing it away to tear it to pieces at its leisure. Who oftenest plays the part of destroyer to our young men? Is it not the man who makes it his business to induce men, and especially young men, to drink that he may be enriched? By him our thoughtless boys, sporting in innocence, are destroyed body and soul, many of them every year.

Dulled Faculties

Let us tell young men the new discoveries of scientific men which show that even the most moderate drinking dims their efficiency, and so their success. For example, Dr. V. H. Rutherford, of the British Parliament, in an address in London, showed that not only is the score of a soldier at the target affected unfavorably by even a glass or two of wine, but so small an indulgence makes a measurable difference in the time it takes to recognze a color or to decide even the smallest matter requiring judgment.

Our readers have been hearing for years about Luther Burbank, "the plant wizard," who has become famous throughout the world on account of his production of new varieties of fruits and flowers. Luther Burbank is not a temperance lecturer or the editor of a Prohibition paper. He is simply a cool-headed, clear-eyed man of science, who tells things as he sees them, without reference to their bearing on the temperance question. Not long since Mr. Burbank printed an article against tobacco and alcohol, which was as follows:

"If I answered your question by saying that I never used tobacco and alcohol in any form, and rarely coffee or tea, you might say that was a personal preference and proved nothing. But I can prove to you most conclusively that even the mild use of stimulants is incompatible with work requiring accurate attention and definite concentration. To assist me in my work of budding—work that is as accurate and exacting as watchmaking—I have a force of twenty men. I have to discharge men from this force if incompetent. Some time ago my foreman asked me if I took pains to inquire into the personal habits of my men. On being answered in the negative he surprised me by saying that the men I found unable to do the delicate work of budding invariably turned out to be smokers or drinkers. These men, while able to do the rough work of farming, call budding and other delicate work 'puttering,' and have to give it up owing to inability to concentrate their nerve force.

Burbank's Testimony

"Even men who smoke one cigar a day cannot be trusted with some of the most delicate work. Cigarettes are even more damaging than cigars, and their use by young boys is little short of criminal and will produce in them the same results that sand placed in a watch will produce—destruction. I do not think that anybody can possibly bring up a favorable argument for the use of cigarettes by boys. Several of my young acquaintances are in their graves, who gave promise of making happy and useful citizens, and there is no question whatever that cigarettes alone were the cause of their destruction. No boy living would commence the use of cigarettes if he knew what a useless, soulless, worthless thing they would make of him."

Andrew Carnegie says in his Empire of Business: "The first and most seductive peril, and the destroyer of most young men, is the drinking of liquor. I am no temperance lecturer in disguise, but a man who knows and tells what observation has proved to him; and I say to you that you are more likely to fail in your career from acquiring the habit of drinking liquor than from any or all the other temptations likely to assail you. You may yield to almost any other temptation and reform—may brace up, and, if not recover lost ground, at least remain in the race, and secure and maintain a respectable position. But from the insane thirst for liquor escape is almost impossible. I have known but few exceptions to this rule."

Rescue of a Drunkard

Dr. C. L. Goodell, of New York, tells this story: "Jimmy was a member of the church, but prosperity came to Jimmy, and as he got money he forgot God. He fell into bad company and began to drink; all his fortune, an interest in a whaling vessel, went down Jimmy's throat until he wasn't worth a dollar. He had a place as salesman in the fishing business, that was all. He hadn't been in a church for years, but I noticed him at meeting one night sitting on the back seat. Somehow, my heart was drawn toward the fellow, and he was moved by the heart-felt interest that he knew I had in him, so he came week after week. Sometimes he would be sober and sometimes he would be so drunk that I hardly knew if he could get out of the church alone.

"One Sunday night Jimmy came in and dropped heavily down in the back seat. I was in the pulpit and I said to myself, 'He has either been drinking more than usual or else there is something going on. No, Jimmy is sober enough so that he knows what is going on.' After the service was over Jimmy had taken his place again on the back seat. I went to him and threw my arm around his shoulder and talked to him. He said, 'Doctor, I want it and I am going to turn over a new leaf, but I have got to have just one more drink.' I said to him: 'You want something to eat, Jimmy.' He replied, 'I guess you are right; I haven't had anything to eat to-day. I had a drink this morning, and two or three more at noon and another to-night, and I haven't had anything to eat to-day.' I got him down to a restaurant where they had nothing but tea and coffee to drink. I ordered black coffee and beefsteak, and after he had eaten the steak and drank two or three cups of coffee he began to feel quite like himself, and he said, 'I feel better; I guess I will go home now.' I said, 'I will go home with you.' At the front steps he said 'good night.' I answered, 'I will go up with you to your room and see you tucked into bed.' So I stepped in and tucked him in bed and talked with him, and then went home. When he heard my feet echoing down the street, he said to himself, 'Now the minister is gone, I will put on my clothes and go down and have a good drink and a good time.' He got out of bed and started to put on his clothes, when all at once he stopped and said, 'I won't do it; I am a mean man but I am not mean enough to do that. After the minister was kind enough to come clear home with me and tuck me into bed, I am not mean enough to go back on him.' A strange thing happened when Jimmy woke up the next morning; for the first time in twenty-five years he didn't want any liquor. I can't explain it, but I know it is a fact that Jimmy didn't want any liquor and he didn't get any. He went on day after day, and he didn't want any liquor, and he came into the meeting and gave his testimony."

A NEW MONUMENT IN RICHMOND

AT the annual reunion of the Confederate Veterans at Richmond, Va., on June 3, there was unveiled a large monument to Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederacy.

The monument was the result of a long campaign by the society known as the United Daughters of the Confederacy, which has been collecting money for the purpose for eighteen years.

There were several thousand ex-Confederates in the parade that marched to the unveiling. A large number of these appeared in gray uniforms. The bands played Southern airs. Addresses at the monument were delivered by Governor Claud Swanson, of Virginia, and Mayor Carlton McCarthy, of Richmond. Gen. Clement A. Evans was introduced as the orator of the day.

The orator sketched the career of Mr. Davis from his Indian campaigns through his service in Mexico, where he commanded a regiment of Mississippi Rifles at Monterey and Buena Vista; in the United States Senate, and lastly as President of the Confederacy.

The Jefferson Davis Memorial

William Jennings Bryan and his wife sat on the platform with the invited guests.

At the conclusion of the speech-making, the daughter of Mr. Davis, Mrs. J. A. Hayes, of Colorado Springs, Col., pulled the cord that held the canvas shroud that covered the statue. She was assisted by her two sons.

The monument is the work of E. V. Valentine and William C. Noland. There is a semi-circular colonnade terminating at each end in a square pier. A large shaft rises from the centre of the half-circle.

The bronze figure of Davis stands on a large block of granite before the column, about twelve feet above the roadway. The figure is in a standing position, with one arm outstretched, the other hand resting on the pages of a book.

Richmond already has monuments of Lee and Stuart.

THE REVIVAL IN SEATTLE

EVANGELIST J. Q. A. HENRY and his singer, Mr. J. Raymond Hemminger, lately conducted a series of very remarkable Gospel meetings in Seattle, Wash. There were many conversions and the churches were greatly strengthened.

Dr. Henry's evangelistic career has been an eventful one, taking him into many lands. In March last he concluded a long and successful temperance and evangelistic campaign in Great Britain. It covered five and a half years, during which he visited 150 of the principal cities of England, Scotland and Wales, going as far north as the Orkney Islands. He addressed more than three million people, took nearly 160,000 total abstinence pledges and had more than 30,000 people publicly avow their acceptance of and consecration to the Saviour.

Rev. Dr. Henry

J. Raymond Hemminger

People of all classes and conditions were among the number. Titled women, professional men, working men and children, drunkards, anarchists, atheists renounced their sins and came under the cleansing blood of Christ. To-day, many of these are ardent soul-winners.

In Paisley, Scotland, where three short campaigns were conducted, more than 3,500 confessed the Saviour. On the three closing nights there were respectively 159, 202 and 263 public surrenders to God. In Belfast, Ireland, six different visits were made, 8,000 total abstinence pledges given, and nearly 4,000 avowals of Christ as Saviour recorded. In Scotland over 10,000 conversions were recorded.

Dr. Henry has associated with him, as soloist and choir leader, Mr. J. Raymond Hemminger, an effective soul-winner. Together they now propose to conduct united revival services in communities of from 5,000 to 50,000 persons, spending about a month in each place. Preference will be given to communities that make spiritual preparation. For their meetings at Hoquiam, Wash., a new auditorium seating 2,500 has been erected and great blessing was being experienced. From Hoquiam they go to Aberdeen, six miles away, where a tabernacle is building. The evangelists have received an invitation to spend two years in an extended tour of Queensland, Australia, and New Zealand. The work will be conducted mainly under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association.

OUR FAMINE RELIEF WORK IN CHINA

ALTHOUGH the acute stage of the great famine in China is over and the suffering in almost all of the affected districts relieved for the present, the shortage of crops is occasioning serious apprehensions of a renewal of the trouble in many places. A cable dispatch from the editor of the North China Herald was received this week as follows:

"SHANGHAI, June 6.

"DR. KLOPSCH, New York: Indications that many districts will have difficulty in weathering winter owing to shortage of crops. Repetition of refugee camps is feared and precautionary measures are urged. Government and foreigners are storing grain as far as possible for coming emergency."

It is clear from the foregoing that the provincial authorities are alive to the danger, and are making provision in time. The Buford and Logan cargoes are now being distributed in the famine districts with excellent results. The Shanghai Relief Committee reports that the authorities have co-operated most actively in this great task. The viceroy wrote to the committee placing launches at its disposal for use along the Canal, the launches to sail under the Chinese flag. He offered to defray all expenses, including cost of coal, to show the people that these are government vessels and they would consequently be better protected.

Twenty more missionaries have volunteered their services in connection with the distribution of the food cargoes. The Chinese gentry have sent $10,000 to be distributed amongst the poor people with which to buy foodstuffs. This flour also will be distributed under the supervision of one or more foreign missionaries sent down by the Chinkiang Committee. During the last week there have been forwarded to the famine district about 75,000 bags of flour and quantities of seed potatoes.

A missionary in Huaiyuen writes:

We are doing a little in a comparatively small way to relieve the starving, by the help of funds contributed mostly in America. We have about eight hundred at work on relief works, and the number is being daily increased.

The prospects of the wheat harvest here are excellent. There is a general spirit of hopefulness, but still many are starving. One is beset on all sides by appeals to be allowed to work, and it needs physical violence often to get away from those who apply, but cannot be taken on.

Pitiful stories of suffering continue to come in from the outlying districts. In one village a mother had sold her boy of ten years and her little girl of three for four strings of cash (about $2). Though their clothes were in tatters and their faces ashen with hunger, still the mother's heart clung to her children.

Another woman said: "I am starving. I have been to town to sell my only child, a son one and a half years old. I got 400 cash (40 cents) for him; here is the money; please give me that amount of flour."

Among the latest contributions received immediately before the close of our Relief Fund was the following from Rev. E. E. Baker, of the First Presbyterian Church, Oakland, Calif.:

"I had the pleasure of participating in the exercises previous to the sailing of the Buford and now take pleasure in enclosing my check for $100 for the Chinese Famine Fund. This is the contribution of Oakland Lodge of Perfection. Wishing you every blessing in your noble work, I am, etc."

A UNIVERSAL FOOD
Following Nature's Footsteps

"I have a boy two years old, weighing for pounds and in perfect health who has bee raised on Grape-Nuts and milk.

"This is an ideal food and evidently fu nishes the elements necessary for a baby well as for adults. We have used Grape-Nu in large quantities and greatly to our adva tage."

One advantage about Grape-Nuts Food that it is pre-digested in the process of manu facture; that is, the starch contained in th wheat and barley is transformed into grape sugar by exactly the same method as thi process is carried out in the human body that is, by the use of moisture and long expos ure to moderate warmth, which grows th diastase in the grains and makes the remark able change from starch to grape-sugar.

Therefore, the most delicate stomach ca handle Grape-Nuts and the food is quickl absorbed into the blood and tissue, certain parts of it going directly to building an nourishing the brain and nerve centres. "There's a Reason."

All Looking to Mont-Lawn

IN one of Lady Henry Somerset's vivid sketches of the London slums, she tells of a young girl in affluent circumstances who went down to make her home among the poorest people, in order that she might help where help was possible. At a late hour of a sultry night, she overheard the conversation of two wee "gutter-snipes," who were crouched upon the squalid doorsteps beneath her window. The black pavement was glistening with slippery mud; high overhead a narrow strip of sky showed between the roofs of the tall, dark tenements. The children, little more than babies, settled themselves with weary sighs, as one said, "I can't go in to-night; faver and mover's bof boozed." Suddenly one of the children began to sing in a shrill, sweet voice, which sounded almost uncanny as it broke the stillness of the night, and floated up, up to the strip of star-spangled sky so far away:

There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign—

"Don't!" said the other child quickly, in a voice that was sharp with pain; "It makes me fink of the country, and I can't abear it, 'cause I'm here."

The little singing voice stopped, and the listener at the window heard in the silence the sound of a child crying softly in the darkness. Can you hear it also, reader? That one child-voice is echoed by hundreds—ay, thousands—here in this vast, pitiless city, where even the night cannot hide the dirt and squalor or the streets, nor quench the misery and pain of the child-heart.

Lady Henry's watcher at the window has her prototype in many a tenement street. There are scores of noble women who cannot rest while there are tears to be dried and sorrows to be assuaged; these women are in the Settlement Houses, the Day Nurseries, the Mission Schools of the tenement sections of the metropolis, and they are doing all they can to better the condition of the children's daily — and nightly—lives. A letter just received by the Children's Home Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from one such woman pleads the cause of the little ones "beneath her window" as only one can plead who lives among them day by day. "The season has come," she writes, "when all day long, from every side, eager voices, reinforced by wistful faces, are asking, 'Please may we go to Mont-Lawn pretty soon?' I know you have many calls, but this is such a needy neighborhood. The population here has suffered much during the severe winter, but it has been hardest for the little children. Fuel was dear, and the miserable rooms were tightly closed up to keep out the cold, until the children were almost poisoned with foul air."

The same letter goes on to outline a catastrophe which holds a heart-break in the fear it arouses for the helpless babies, who must be the chief sufferers. There has been a sullen, determined longshoremen's strike along the docks. The immediate results hold enough of menace, for the simplest foodstuffs that make for health are dearer and scarcer than at this period last year, owing to the late season; but the coming summer's prospects for the families of the strikers are little short of appalling, since many who have rebelled will never be employed upon the docks again, whichever way the strike is settled. There is a stern justice in the fact that the men must "take their medicine," but what shall be done—what shall we do—for the innocent, helpless children of such families?

The "Other Poor Children on our Floor"

One little blue-eyed German maid prints in cramped characters and wonderful spelling:

I was sick last winter, and the doctor said that I must go into the country or I could never get well. But my papa hasn't been working for four months, so I can't possibly go unless you will take me to Mont Lawn. Two years ago you let me go, and I was there to see the corner-stone laid of the Children's Temple. I shall never forget it, for it was lovely. Please may I go now and get well? Mamma says she'll bring me to the Bible House when you say so. Please let me know soon. There are four other poor little girls on our floor, and they would just love to go, too. Can they? Yours respectfully, MARY S.

How shall we answer that letter and a multitude of others similar to it? There lies Mont-Lawn among "the everlasting hills." There are her spacious dormitories, with their long rows of empty white cots, inviting to sweet repose. There are the broad, green meadows, the whispering branches of the giant elms, the life-giving breezes from the shining river. Shall they go, the "four other poor little girls on our floor," whom invalid Mabel, even in her own extremity, does not forget? For $3 each of them can be given ten long, health-inducing, joyful days in what is to them indeed a "land of pure delight"; $21 will keep one of the empty cots full all the summer through.

One big-hearted Oklahoman a month ago sent a generous check for "the children to go to the country," adding: "I hope I am not sending it too early." If a few of those "too early" checks did not come at the beginning of the season, what response could we make to the avalanche of eager, sometimes desperate applications which come from those who are not in the least afraid of being "too early"?

Little Stories of Salvation

One day there came tumbling into the Rescue Mission on Franklin Street, in Portland, Me., on the free coffee night, a man who had sold the shoes off his feet for rum; the bottoms of his trousers were fringed, his hair matted, face bloated and red as that of an Indian in war paint. While the service was going on he was fed and then he began to take an interest in what was passing before him on the platform. After a straightforward talk the leader asked any who needed prayers to raise their hands. The man got up suddenly and said: "If there is any one that needs praying for it's I." It was a sudden turn to the right road, but that man has for five years been an active member of Rev. Bomley Green's church, trying to win others to Christ. Yet until he had entered the Rescue Mission he says that he had not been sober for seven and a half years, a proof that the best antidote for strong drink in the body is love of Christ in the heart.

The following extract from the letter of a young man who has at last found the "way of life" is the epitome of the early days of many another man who thinks he must "see life" in its worst aspect in order to enjoy it. "I left the shelter of home," he writes, "when I was fifteen and joined the British navy. There I learned to drink and was arrested several times. I at last came to America to do better, but I was without the help of God, and I turned out as bad as ever, drinking, gambling, and doing other things that the devil calls having a good time. I landed in an inebriate asylum. One day I was sitting there wishing that God would strike me dead. He did strike me, not with death, but with life. As I sat there my eye fell on a paper containing the report of a mission. I read on until I came to where a man had been converted by a song: 'Can a Man Forget his Mother's Prayers?' The question came to me, could I? I thought of her on her knees praying to her Father in heaven to watch over me. I fell on my knees and prayed. Now my mother's prayers are answered. She is getting pleasant letters. I feel also that the Lord has work for me to do."

THE PUNISHMENT OF DEEDEE*

I GUESS mebby the angels kept on singin' as joyful as ever up in Heaven. I guess, mebby, somewhere out west further, the sun was shinin' down gay on noddin', careless flowers. Mebby, even in the next block, some good baby was bein' snuggled up in its ma's arms; but to Deedee, lyin' in the corner of her crib, the world had got a million years older in about a minute. Her world that had been all smiles and pleasant things had turned into a world of hard words and cruel faces. Her mama dear had on a mask of unfeelin' coldness. Her papa dear stood up there towerin' above her, a sort of giant of wrath, flourishin' an awful, mysterious weapon, the word "spank."

From the bedroom come a low, maddenin' wail:—

"Mama, laim! Papa, laim!"

It kept gittin' louder. It got to be a regular cry, punctuated off here and there with calls for "laim."

Marthy looked at me, hopeless. I seen the look and looked down at my plate.

Now, or never, was the time to spank; but we was a ridiculous tender-hearted family, and, as the dinner went on, the spankin' of Deedee loomed up bigger than Pike's Peak. It piled up huge and record-breakin' above the tea-pots and the pudding's, and looked about as important as the end of the world, or a big war.

When we got up it was like the condemned goin' to the execution, and we marched into the front room like a jury, bringin' in the death verdict, files into the court room.

Deedee still cried for "laim."

Well, I went into that bedroom. Deedee left off cryin' when she seen me, and in the dim light I could see her standin' in the crib. I stuck out my hand to take her, and she hung on to it.

"Papa, laim!" she begged.

"Edith," I says, hoarse in my throat, "you've been naughty. Papa told you to go to sleep, and mama told you to go to sleep. When we tell you to go to sleep, you've got to go to sleep. Now, this is the last time I'm goin' to tell you. Will you lie down and go to sleep?"

"Papa, laim!" she says, impatient. I set my mouth and lifted her up and laid her on the bed on her face and held her there. She struggled and yelled.

"Be quiet!" I says, "be quiet, or I will spank you!"

She gave one long, lingerin' cry for "laim."

I took a long breath, and lifted up my hand—and—and—I ain't a-goin' to tell about that. Let's go into the other room. There set the three other grown-ups, holdin' their hands over their ears, with pained-lookin' faces.

That baby, shocked and surprised, laid on the pillow thinkin', as much as a baby could think. Something cruel and unexpected had happened to her.

"Papa!" she pleaded.

I jumped up from my chair. Evidently that child needed—

"Papa, kiss!" says Deedee, soft and pleadin'.

Well, I rather guess we all kissed her! We hugged her until she was gaspin' for breath, and she smiled at us, and forgive us all, even while the sobs come once in a while to interfere with her smilin'.

"Ain't she a dear, dear baby?" cried Marthy. "Poor little thing!"

When we had loved her enough to spoil any good the spankin' had done, Marthy drove us out.

"Come, deary," she says to Deedee, "say your little prayers, mama forgot."

Deedee pressed up against her ma's knee, joyous.

"Now I—"Marthy prompts her.

"Nowee—" says Deedee.

"Lay me—"says Marthy.

"Laim," says Deedee, tickled as you please, and then wonderin' why the whole lot of us shouts out "Laim!" of a sudden, and why we laugh and crowd 'round her, and kiss her, and kiss her!

"Poor baby!" says Marthy. "To be spanked for wantin' to say her prayers!"

"By George!" says Uncle Edward. "Talk about your martyrs! She beats the whole bunch!"

American Pioneers

EVERY true American owes a distinct debt of gratitude to the projectors of The Journal of American History. So rich in historical records of our country's pioneers, their customs, their struggles, and their victories, is the second quarter's number of the first volume of this dignified and valuable addition to the Americana in literature, that the reader is driven to speculation as to how long such a superlative degree of excellence can be maintained. Dipping at random into the pages of this "Ter-Centenary Number"—its type, its paper, and its illustrations all triumphs of the publisher's art—the eye and the mind alike dwell with delight upon the wealth of reproductions from rare prints and works of art, and upon the alluring titles which invite to prolonged study of the subject matter. Under such heads as Voyages of an Old Sea Captain, Home Life in Old America, Customs and Practices of the First Physicians, the "stories of men and events that have entered into the building of the Western Continent" are related with that vigor of style and accuracy of detail which render the Journal a valuable aid to students of American history as well as to that constantly increasing class in America's twentieth century civilization which is addicted to genealogical research. The magazine, edited by Francis Trevelyan Miller, is issued quarterly at an annual subscription price of two dollars, and is published by the Associated Publishers of American Records at New Haven, Conn.

Books Received

Letters from Tuskegee, by Rupert Fehnstoke. A little volume of impressions gathered from a sojourn at Booker T. Washington's educational institution. Pp. 85, cloth. Price 75 cents. Published by Dr. Becker von Grabill, 204 East King Street, Lancaster, Pa.

Seldom is it the fortune of the book reviewer to find such admirable matter for comment as is contained in Book One of the series of Guide Books to English, prepared by Ada Van Stone Harris, Assistant Superintendent of Schools in Rochester, N. Y., and Charles B. Gilbert, former Superintendent of Schools in Rochester, Newark and St. Paul. The book not only gives a working knowledge of the principles of correct expression, but it inculcates a love for the best in literature by its historical, imaginative and biographical selections. Silver, Burdett & Co., New York and Chicago. Illustrated. Pp. 307. Price 45 cents.

John Wilson Townsend comes to his work con amore, in the biographical history of Richard Hackman Menefee, which he has incorporated in book form. Hitherto, the great Kentucky orator and lawyer-politician has found no adequate biographer, although Marshall's eulogy has made for him a lasting place in Southern literature bearing upon heroes of history. The young "Patrick Henry of the West" could find no fault, were he alive to judge, with the tribute of respect which Mr. Townsend offers him, in the complete "life" and collection of his speeches which has recently come from the press of the Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington. Pp. 320. Price, postpaid, $3.17.

In this age of multitudinous publication, the historico-religious novel has become the favorite of a very large and growing section of the reading public. The most notable new production of this class is The Star of Valhalla, by Myra Gross, which, the critics say, is one of the greatest stories that has appeared since Lew Wallace wrote Ben Hur. It is a love tale of the days of the Vikings, and deals with the first encounter of those hardy warriors with the new and mysterious spiritual force—Christianity. The Christian girl, who plays a most dramatic part in the story, is a charming figure of heroic, consecrated womanhood. Readers will find the book a fascinating one—powerful in its portraiture of the wild, impetuous Norse warriors and their grim religion with its human sacrifices, and especially so in the thrilling story of the perils and temptations of their beautiful hostage. The book will hold the interest of the reader from beginning to end. Illustrated in colors; price $1.50. Frederick A. Stokes & Co., New York, publishers.

The President and the Farmers

From Mr. Roosevelt's Speech to the Michigan Agriculturists, May 31

; every great crisis of the past a peculiar dependence has had to be placed upon the farming population; and this dependence has hitherto been justified. But nnot be justified in the future if agriure is permitted to sink in the scale as pared with other employments. We not afford to lose that pre-eminently ical American, the farmer who owns his farm.

et it would be idle to deny that in the half century there has been in the tern half of our country a falling off in relative condition of the tillers of the , although signs are multiplying that nation has waked up to the danger and reparing to grapple effectively with it. t would be a calamity to have our farms upied by a lower type of people than hard working, self-respecting, independent and essentially manly and womanly n and women who have hitherto constited the most typically American, and on whole the most valuable, element in our ire nation. Ambitious native born young n and women who now tend away from farm must be brought back to it, and erefore they must have social as well as nomic opportunities. Everything should done to encourage the growth in the n farming country of such institutional and social movements as will meet the demand of the best type of farmers.

There should be libraries, assembly halls, social organizations of all kinds. The school building and the teacher in the school building should, throughout the country districts, be of the very highest type, able to fit the boys and girls not merely to live in, but thoroughly to enjoy and to make the most of the country. The country church must be revived.

All kinds of agencies, from rural free delivery to the bicycle and the telephone, should be utilized to the utmost; good roads should be favored; everything should be done to make it easier for the farmer to lead the most active and effective intellectual, political and economic life.

The people of our farming regions must be able to combine among themselves as the most efficient means of protecting their industry from the highly organized interests which now surround them on every side.

A vast field is open for work by co-operative associations of farmers in dealing with the relation of the farm to transportation and to the distribution and manufacture of raw materials. It is only through such combination that American farmers can develop to the full their economic and social power.

Helping the Finnish Seamen

MONG the various forms of Christian work that have been established at the rt of New York in behalf of the immiunts from foreign shores, t which deals with the nnish seaman is one of most meritorious. The nnish Seamen's Mission New York was organed to preach the Gospel Finnish sailors and imgrants, regardless of nomination. It distribes good literature in the nnish and Swedish lanages. Its workers visit lors at saloons and arding-houses, and perade them to attend reious services. They visit spitals and read and lk to the sick. Furtherore, they help the poor innish immigrants where lp is needed, and look lost sons and daughrs. In all this work, the main object—uls to Christ—is never forgotten.

Rev. Mr. Hohenthal

Rev. Thorsten M. Hohenthal, pastor of e mission, says: "Our work is difficult, rgely on account of the poverty of the ission. We have depended wholly on e Lord; our struggles have never been ade known here, and we have never sked for assistance. As the salaries of the minister, sexton, etc., are very small, we can render very little assistance from our own means. The fact that the ministers of this mission have never been able to remain here more than three or four years shows that the work is very hard. They have exerted themselves to the utmost until they have broken down. Besides preaching from twenty-five to thirty times a month, the minister has to reply to from ten to twelve letters daily, make almost daily visits to hospital or prison, and visit vessels several times a week, as well as saloons and boarding-houses. He is also expected to take charge of the savings of such sailors as are fortunate enough to have any.

"Our need of assistance," he added, "is very great, and I pray to God that some one who is able to render that assistance will hear our cry and be led to answer it."

The pastor may be addressed at No. 114 Garfield Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., by any reader who is disposed to make further inquiries concerning the work of the mission.

Christ in Africa*

FULLY one-eighth of the world's population exists in Africa, yet it is only within this century that any exact nowledge of the continent has been gained. len still living remember that in their choolboy days the best atlases gave a here rim along the coast line as the extent hat was known. The interior was unnown, a land in which no white man had et his foot. The beginning of our knowldge came with missionary enterprise. udwig Krapft and John Rebmann, misionaries of the Church Missionary Society, enetrated from the east coast in 1844. ivingstone, of the London Missionary ociety, began his exploration in 1849, and inally succeeded in crossing the continent rom Loanda to the south of the Zambesi. hen, the way being opened, the scientific explorers followed. Burton and Speke and Baker and Stanley carried on the work nd revealed to the world undreamed-of onders. Then came the statesmen and he kings, who divided up the continent into pheres of influence, putting the people under tribute and bringing them into subjection. It is a distressing thought that the people of the interior of Africa are forced, in their ignorance, to wonder whether Christianity is represented by Livingstone, Moffatt, Chamberlain and such men, or by the agents of Leopold and other European potentates. Kindness and cruelty, the Gospel of peace and liberty and the relentless tyranny of the taskmaster—poor Africa has experienced all in being civilized on the white man's pattern! It was bad enough before when the Arabs made their slave raids, but the white man has suppressed the Arabs, not that the black man shall be free and happy, but that he may exploit more thoroughly and more mercilessly the mine of wealth the country affords. But there is hope. The curse of greed and avarice must yield to the awakening conscience of Christian lands. It is not that men shall grow rich on the rubber, the gold and the diamonds of Africa that the opportunity of Africa has come to the world. Christ must reign until all his enemies are subdued and then Africa will rejoice in his rule.

No Other Washer Washes in Six Minutes

SIX minutes, by the clock, is time enough to wash a tubful of the dirtiest clothes spotlessly clean with a 1900 Gravity Washer.

And no other washer needs as little help from you. For all you have to do to wash with a 1900 Gravity Washer is sit beside it and help the washing along with little gentle pushes and pulls on the tub handle.

This takes hardly any strength, for the weight of the tub and the little patent links under the tub do most of the work.

They keep the tub swinging back and forth and going up and down with a double "tip-turning" or "oscillating" motion.

And this motion sends the hot soapy water in the tub swirling over, and under, and through, and around the clothes until every bit of the dirt is taken out and they are absolutely clean.

The clothes in the washer stay still while the soapy water takes out the dirt.

Thus your clothes are kept from wearing out.

They cannot rub against anything—not even the smooth sides of the washer tub.

And only in the 1900 Gravity Washer do the clothes stay still while they are being washed.

Therefore, only in the 1900 Gravity Washer are your clothes safe from wear in washing.

No other washer saves your time by washing your clothes so quickly.

No other washer saves your strength by needing so little help to do your washing.

No other washer saves like this, because the savings of time, and work, and wear on clothes are all due to the working parts of my Washer.

And these working parts of my Washer cannot be imitated, because they are patented.

Other concerns may offer you washing machines that look like my 1900 Gravity Washers—

But looks don't wash clothes—nor save time and strength and wear on your clothes.

Only the perfect working parts of a 1900 Gravity Washer will do that.

You can wash laces in my washers and never break a thread.

You can wash carpets also—get them clean in almost no time.

You aren't "beat out" when you finish washing.

You aren't "steam soaked"—weary—worried.

In the last five years I have sold tens and tens of thousands of my time saving—work saving—clothes saving washers.

Thousands upon thousands pleased women can tell you how much my washers have saved them.

It keeps a big factor—the biggest factor—of its kind in the world—busy all the time, filling orders for my washers.

Do you wish to own a 1900 Gravity Washer?

Would you like to find out for yourself what a 1900 Gravity Washer will save?

If so, you can prove my claims, at my expense. This proof shan't cost you a penny.

For I will send a 1900 Gravity Washer to any responsible party to use for a Month—FREE.

I will ship you the Washer and prepay the freight. And all you need do is—take the washer home and use it.

Do four weeks' washings.

Wash your dirtiest clothes.

Then—if you don't find the washer all I claim—then't keep it. Just tell me you don't want the washer and that will settle it.

I won't argue with you. For I say "I'll leave the decision to you," and I will.

The month's use you have of the washer won't cost you a penny.

You don't send me a cent of money in advance and you don't send any afterward unless you decide to keep the washer.

If you want to keep the washer—if you see how it will save your time and strength and clothes—and if you see how this saving will be worth money enough to more than pay for the washer in a few months—why then—I will let you Pay Me for the Washer as It saves for You.

Pay by the week—or by the month, "suit yourself."

This way you Let the Washer Pay for Itself.

Could I do better for you than this?

INTO STILL WATERS

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

CHAPTER XX—Concluded

"IS that my—mother?" she asked at last, in a low voice.

"No, no, dear, no," murmured the doctor, abstractedly; then he added, turning to Mrs. McGinnis: "Why, woman, I'd stake my life that she's Margaret Kendall. There was the name and the handkerchief; besides, she looks like Mrs. Kendall. She has her eyes."

"Yes, I know," acknowledged Mrs. McGinnis, "an' it's her, no doubt. Still, if there was a way somehow—if Mis' Kendall could see her first, before you had told her you had found her; if—"

"I have it," cut in the doctor, suddenly, his face alight as a swift thought came to him. "Keep Margaret here. I'll be back!" And with the words he was gone.

Down at Five Oaks a little later he forced himself to walk calmly up the steps between the two stone lions. Mrs. Kendall herself met him on the veranda.

"You've not—given up?" she faltered nervously, as he took her hand in both of his.

"No, dear friend," he said quietly, wondering if she could hear the exultant pounding of the heart so near her own. "I shall never give up. I have come with—with another story."

A swift red showed in Mrs. Kendall's cheeks as she sat down—she remembered a certain other "story" that this same man had told her not long before. The doctor saw the blush and divined its cause—a fact which did not tend to steady his voice.

"I have found a new object for your love, a new candidate for your sympathy, Mrs. Kendall—a little girl whose short life has seen much misery; a child who, I believe, has no mother unless you yourself will be one to her. Will you—love her?"

Quick tears sprang to Mrs. Kendall's eyes.

"Poor little dear! I love her already," she said gently.

"And will you take her into your—home?"

"Doctor! You wouldn't, you couldn't ask me to do that!"

"I know, it is much to ask," he said.

For a moment the woman opposite did not speak; then she began hurriedly:

"I have learned much in the past year, doctor. I have suffered much—I have given up much, but there is yet one spot that quivers at the lightest touch—there is yet one thing I can not bring myself to change. You must know what that is."

"Yes, I know, but I had hoped—" The doctor paused, leaving his sentence unfinished.

"I can not, doctor. No foot but mine has ever crossed the threshold of that room. No hand but mine has ever touched toy or book. They are as my dear little girl left them. Don't you see? Can't you understand?"

The doctor bowed his head.

"I understand," he said gently.

It was a long minute before Mrs. Kendall spoke again.

"Where is the child? Tell me about her."

"I brought her with me."

"Oh!" There was real pain in Mrs. Kendall's voice. "Then she is here!"

"Yes."

"But—tell me about her."

The doctor hesitated. Should he give this mother the history of those four years of suffering, misery and want? That the child was Margaret Kendall he did not doubt, and if she was, the mother would insist some time on knowing all that he knew of those four years. Perhaps, after all, it might be as well to tell it now when she could not know for the time being that it was the life story of her own child to which she was listening.

The doctor raised his head.

"Yes, I will tell you," he said. "I will begin with the time when, as a very little girl, she was set to work sewing on buttons in an attic room in New York."

Slowly, softly, and very tenderly the doctor began his story, telling everything that he had been able to discover of Margaret's daily life during those four years, omitting only that part which might serve to identify her as the lost Margaret Kendall. From Margaret's own lips he had learned much, and this, together with what he had discovered from other sources, made his story complete.

Very gently he touched upon the want and suffering, and pictured the lonely little maid with the whole world to fight alone. He told of the attic sweat-shop, and of the cellar where tiny little fingers pasted bags. He told of the dinnerless days and supperless nights, and of the struggles to maintain the co-operative housekeeping establishment in one corner of the Whalen basement. He pictured, too, the result of all the neglect and abuse, and gently touched upon the qualities that made the poor little half-starved waif the "terror of the Alley." Then he told of Mont-Lawn and of the blessed change it had wrought; of the sunshine and cheer that one little maid had brought back to the Alley. He finished by picturing Margaret as she was now, with her winsomeness, and her hunger to be loved and "wanted."

As the last word fell from the doctor's lips Mrs. Kendall sprang to her feet. Her lips trembled and her eyes were wet.

"I will take the child," she said brokenly. "Bring her to me."

Not trusting himself to speak, the man turned and hurried down the steps. Half an hour later he passed once more between the stone lions, leading a nine-year-old little girl by the hand. Silently old Mrs. Barrett admitted them to the little reception-room, and went to call her mistress.

Doctor Spencer was sitting opposite the door, and he saw Mrs. Kendall's face as she entered the room. There was a long wondering look, then a rapturous cry.

"Margaret—Margaret! My own little girl!" And Mrs. Kendall was on her knees with the child in a close embrace.

Very softly the doctor turned to go. The place was sacred—he had no right to be there. He had almost reached the door when there was a swift step at his side. A slender hand touched his arm. Mrs. Kendall, with Margaret still clasped to her heart, was looking with luminous eyes into his face.

"And you," she faltered, "it is to you I owe it all!" For an infinitesimal moment she paused; then the rich red dyed her face. "I'll be as—happy as you like, now," she whispered.

"And the doctor was just as glad to see my mother as I was," said Margaret afterwards; "else why did he kiss her too?"

THE END

Russia's Famine Ended

The Russian Famine Committee has notified its representatives in London and New York that the famine is over, and Russia now is able to care for her own people. The assistance sent Finland from Britain and the United States has done inestimable good, and has been a mighty weapon to force the Russian government to do its duty. With the latest Douma appropriations, the aid given by the State totals $87,000,000, of which $6,000,000 will be devoted to fighting the scurvy in Ufa province and elsewhere, and in maintaining eating places. These food stations at present number 30,000, and are feeding two and a half million persons.

The outlook for the harvest in Central Russia is the most promising of a dozen years past.

WENT TO TEA

And It Wound Her Bobbin

Tea drinking frequently affects people as badly as coffee. A lady in Salisbury, Md., says that she was compelled to abandon the use of coffee a good many years ago, because it threatened to ruin her health and that she went over to tea drinking, but finally, she had dyspepsia so bad that she had lost twenty-five pounds and no food seemed to agree with her.

She further says: "At this time I was induced to take up the famous food drink, Postum, and was so much pleased with the results that I have never been without it since. I commenced to improve at once, regained my twenty-five pounds of flesh and went some beyond my usual weight.

"I know Postum to be good, pure, and healthful, and there never was an article, and never will be, I believe, that does so surely take the place of coffee, as Postum Food Coffee. The beauty of it all is that it is satisfying and wonderfully nourishing. I feel as if I could not sing its praises too loud." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. There's a Reason."

V.). I. C 10: 23, 24.

I. Cor. 8, Paul contrasts love with wledge—"knowledge puffeth up, but buildeth up;" buildeth up, not our- s only, but other people. "And if man thinketh that he knoweth any- g, he knoweth nothing yet as he ght to know." How often we have d moderate drinkers declare how h they knew of the evil of drunken- , but that for themselves they were ered stimulants by doctors, and they ld think it very wrong to abstain— knew how to take it in moderation. ed up by their own knowledge of how much drink they might take with impunity, they condemn the weakness of the poor hapless drunkard. And some poor tempted servant, with no such knowledge, has reflected thus: "If my master, who is known as such a Christian man, thinks it right to use stimulants, how much more should I, who make no such profession." And the servant, having no such power of self-control, becomes a drunkard, robs his master's cellar, leaves without a character, and ends either in a prison, a lunatic asylum or a workhouse. The knowledge which puffed up went no way toward saving the poor tempted one.

How many families we have known in which one-half, in some cases the whole family, have fallen through drink! If we visit the prisons, the lunatic asylums, the courts and alleys of our large towns, and search out the cause of thousands becoming mad, thousands being paupers, thousands being out of work, thousands being outcasts upon our streets; the reason will be found, in nine cases out of ten, in the habitual use of intoxicants and narcotics. And none of these victims began by excess. Puffed up by the knowledge, as they thought, of their own strength, they fell, and there was none to help them. "But love buildeth up." That which no other power in all the universe has accomplished, love has done. Jesus has made a way by which the poor, lost drunkard, the harlot, the opium slave, may be redeemed from their sins and misery; even from the very taste and desire of that which has enslaved them, as well as its physical consequences. His love "buildeth up" a temple of the Holy Ghost out of the veriest ruin which drink, uncleanness, or opium have made. For us, his followers, his representatives, the members of his body, what is becoming?

These Beautiful Instruments are the result of many years' experience in the manufacture of organs, and are confidently offered to the public. These musical wonders use no paper, but music is obtained from a roller furnished with pins. The pins operate upon valve keys, made of hard steel. All the working parts of the instrument are easily accessible, and are made of solid metal, the rollers and keys being mounted on metal castings. Nothing has been omitted to give these grand instruments their crowning qualities of extreme simplicity and durability. There is no limit to either kind or quality of music. They will play Hymns and Popular Airs, with a clearness and accuracy, and degree of execution which but few performers can equal. A mere child can play them. They have the carrying quality of a Large Pipe Organ, and are the only instruments that will render slow and sacred music with a powerful, sustaining organ tone. They will play tunes as long as desired, without any break, instead of stopping to change the piece, as must be done with organettes. They are beautifully finished in solid walnut. The reeds are organ size, and the volume of tone will fill a hall. They are Genuine Musical Instruments, which anyone can play, without teacher or practice, and which good musicians can recommend. The price is nothing compared with their intrinsic value. They are equal in every way to a $50 Music Box, so far as the quality of the music is concerned, and also in point of construction, finish, and decoration. This organ is the most simple, perfect, marvelous, instructive, enjoyable, and amusing musical instruments in the world. FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, it is just what is wanted. It will play all the sacred music, and as many verses as desired, without stopping to replace the music roller. The great advantage no other instrument has. By this means, a result is attained that was never reached before.

President McKinley's last words

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at a price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a very much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which have been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete List will be mailed on application.

American Delegates to the Convention

SUNDAY SCHOOLS MEET IN ROME

The Fifth World's Convention and the Important Work it Accomplished

THE Fifth World's Sunday School Convention in Rome, which has just concluded its five days' session, was without doubt the most important congress in Sunday School history. It marked epoch in the development of the movement, for it sulted in the creation of a World's Sunday School sociation, a permanent organization, to promote the Sunday School idea throughout the entire earth. Sunday School leaders consider this the most important forward step taken in many years. It means that unparalleled progress will, with God's blessing, soon be witnessed in Latin and heathen countries, where at present there are only a few struggling Sunday Schools with a handful of children in tendance. The first president chosen for the Assotion was that veteran Christian leader, loved the rld over, Rev. F. B. Meyer of London, and the airman of the Executive Committee was that Amerin business man whose untiring efforts contributed so rgely to the success of the Fifth World's Convention, r. George W. Bailey, of Philadelphia.

The second great achievement of the Convention was e making missions the watchword of the Sunday hools of the world. From first to last, the Conven-n was keyed to a high pitch of missionary enthusiasm. nrough the generosity of the president of the Conven-n, Mr. E. K. Warren, and other Christian leaders, ore than fifty missionaries were brought to the Con-ntion from Europe, Asia, Africa and India. In almost every address was emphasized the fact that the hope of evangelizing the world lies largely with the children of the Sunday Schools. The enthusiasm for missions did not exhaust itself in mere words as the delegates journeyed to Rome on the steamers Romanic and Neckar, for during the time the Convention was in session $75,000 was raised for missionary and Sunday School work, the major part of it being for the purpose of establishing as soon as possible a Methodist mission station in North Algiers, under the direction of Bishop Hartzell.

The Convention which met in the Eternal City was cosmopolitan in every respect. It was deeply impressive to witness an assembly composed of about 1,500 delegates of many colors and dialects, and representing thirty seven different lands, and practically all evangelical creeds. It was interesting to see seated side by side dark-skinned men from Egypt wearing their red fezzes, a still darker representative from India in the person of a college, swarthy delegates from Palestine and the countries of Southern Europe, and the fair-skinned workers from Northern Europe, Canada and the United States. The mass meetings of the Convention were conducted in the English language, with smaller conferences held almost every day in three languages, Italian, German and English.

The singing of the Convention, which was under the excellent leadership of Rev. Carey Bonner, secretary of the London Sunday School Union, was a striking feature of the great gathering. A number of hymns were sung simultaneously by the delegates in English, German, Italian and French. The hymn-book used, which was prepared under the direction of Mr. Bonner, contained eighty-four songs in English, which were used at the previous World's Convention in Jerusalem. It also contained twelve other songs printed in three or four of the above languages and the Italian national hymn. On several occasions during the Convention, much enthusiasm was aroused by the superb singing of a large Italian choir, and of companies of boys and girls from the Methodist schools in Rome.

The meetings of the Convention were held in the auditorium of the beautiful Methodist Episcopal church, seating about 1,200 people. It was handsomely decorated with palms and with flags of many nations, was located in the heart of the city and made an ideal place for such a gathering. The meetings were presided over chiefly by the president of the Convention, Mr. E. K. Warren, of Three Oaks, Mich., assisted by Bishop William Burt, of Switzerland; Rev. Carey Bonner and Mr. F. F. Belsey, J.P., of London, and Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, Mr. H. J. Heinz and Mr. A. B. McCrillis of America. The speakers of the Convention were of two classes: first, men whose names are household words throughout England and America, as Rev. F. B. Meyer, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Bishop J. C. Hartzell, Mr. Marion Lawrence and Rev. B. B. Tyler, D.D.; and second, brief addresses from Sunday School workers in many lands, telling of the condition and progress of the movement in their respective countries.

The first meeting of the Convention, held on Saturday evening, was one of the most memorable of the entire series. The delegates were welcomed to Italy by Rev. Enrico Piggott, president of the Italian National Committee. Then came a genuine surprise. It was announced that the delegates would also be welcomed by Miss Italia Garibaldi, granddaughter of Garibaldi, the liberator of Italy, and that she was a teacher in the Methodist Sunday School in Rome. At these words, the enthusiasm of the Convention became unbounded, and as the young lady mounted the platform, the audience arose in a body, amid tumultuous cheering, clapping and waving of handkerchiefs. The applause continued for some time, while tears ran down many cheeks, and the young lady was so overcome by

A BRIMFUL FAITH

TEXT: John 2:7
"And they filled them up to the brim"

If there is any passage in the Bible which teaches us to expect big things from God it is the sentence which I have chosen for my text. When Jesus commanded the servants at the wedding of Cana of Galilee to fill up the water-pots they did not go grumbling around saying, "Oh, what is the use? What the guests need is wine, not water. Besides, Jesus is not asking us to fill one water-pot, but six of them! Why, those six water-pots will hold one hundred and thirty-five gallons. Think of the long distance we will have to travel down to the well to get that water! Think of all the fun and the music and the songs we will lose while we are gone." No, those young men spake not thus. They obeyed orders. If they had known what was about to occur they would have said: "If Christ can change the water into wine, then the more water we have, the more wine we shall have." So they took their buckets and started off for the well. They kept emptying the water into the water-pots, until the water ran over the tops of the water-pots. "And they filled them up to the brim." They did big things for God and they got big things. May we to-day learn to have "a brimful faith." May we expect God to bless us mightily in every department of life, and in our youth and middle age and old age, and make great preparations for the coming spiritual blessings.

Faith in Prayer

Let us, in the first place, have a brimful faith in reference to our prayers. Let us learn that prayer to God is not a narrow ledge of rock upon the side of a mighty precipice where we must stand trembling and pleading for eternal life, or else our feet will slip, and we will tumble into the bottomless pit. But prayer is the broad invitation God gives to his children to come and talk with him and ask what they will, and he will grant their requests, if it is best for them to be granted. Prayer is a promissory note that God puts into our hands, and we are encouraged to fill it out liberally. Prayer is the hold we have on the power that is capable of recreating ourselves, and recreating our dear ones, and lowering the bars, so that we can enter into great fields of usefulness. Prayer is the most vital spiritual power we have on earth. With it, we can catch the ear of the Lord God Almighty, and he will listen to our petitions and grant them, if it is best for us and for those for whom we pray. What says the Bible? Is there any limitation to the petitions we are to make to God? Nay. All things will be granted for our best welfare if these petitions are made in the spirit of Jesus Christ. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." But though this sweeping invitation is given to make our prayers as big as heaven itself, some of the most miserable and contemptible and insignificant things in the world are those we ask in the circumscribed and limited petitions which we make to God through the gateway of prayer.

A Limited Horizon

In our ideas of prayer we are just as narrow boundaried as are the ideas of some men born away back in the country, who have never seen a steam engine, who have never learned to read a newspaper, and who have never been to a village of larger population than two hundred inhabitants. You go to such a man and say: "My friend, how would you like to go to New York and see the greatest metropolis of the New World?" He answers: "No, I don't want to go. Why, some of the men down at the village store tell me that the buildings there are twenty times higher than my barn. Why, I would be afraid to go there, for fear they would fall down and crack my skull open. And they say the street cars run so fast that they kill people there every day. And they say there are a lot of thieves and murderers there. No New York for me. I prefer to live here in my quiet diggings, where I am not in danger of being killed every step I take." But I say, "My friend, you are not going to keep your children here in the backwoods? There are no schools or churches here. You have a poor, miserable shack of a house, with no carpets on the floors and no pictures upon the walls. Are you going to let your children grow up as ignorant as you are?" "Well," answers the old backwoodsman, "I do not know that book-learning does a man any good. The children have enough to eat. They have enough clothes to wear. They have a room in which to sleep. They do not need a whole lot of luxuries. And then a little dirt does not hurt anybody. I have lived for nigh on to fifty years in these here woods without learning how to read or write, and I guess the children are no better than their father is. If I had to do as I have done, I guess they can do the same." You see that man is an animal, a simple animal. The great wide world, with its music and books, and knowledge and joys and hopes, is utterly beyond his visual range. His largest horizon is a cabbage-patch. Beyond that cabbage-patch he cannot see. Such is the circumscribed horizon of some of us in our prayers.

Self-Forgetful Prayer

Instead of starting with a great sweep of holy desires to benefit all mankind through prayer, instead of filling up six great waterpots with petitions for God's honor and glory, we come to God with a little thimble filled with our selfish desires and we call that prayer. Thus some of us go on year in and year out, making a lot of miserable little selfish petitions, and call those petitions prayer. Not for years have we broadened the scope of our spiritual horizon. Not for years have we made one prayer big enough to obliterate self and take in God's glory and honor. The way some of us make poor, puny, silly, selfish prayers, is enough to make the angels in heaven laugh, were it not for the fact that those prayers are so tragic.

Oh that you and I could grow big enough in divine grace to make the prayer which Paul made, when in the Epistle to the Romans he wrote: "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." That means in plain English: "O God, save my people; save the Jews, the men of my own race. I would die for them; I would even forfeit my own hope of salvation, if by that means they might be won for Christ." Do we ever make such a prayer as that? Do we make our prayers so big that in their desires they will girdle the earth round and round, and embrace the salvation of the whole world? I tell you, if we are going to make a full use of the privilege of prayer, our prayers will have to be made bigger than the little, puny, selfish desires of our hearts.

Unselfish Sufferers

Shall we never grow bigger than self? Are we living and praying for our own personal ends? Thank God, all men are not living for themselves. There are thousands and tens of thousands, some of them far poorer than we, who are living and praying for others. Listen to this remarkable history: During the famous London dock strike of a few years ago, a young man sitting at his breakfast table and reading the story of suffering in the papers, suddenly said: "I have no right to all this plenty while so many are starving." So he went and drew all his money out of the bank. Then he bought a lot of food and started out to find the homes of the strikers. He went to a street near the docks and stopped before one of the biggest tenements and asked the landlady if there were any hungry around? She answered, "Lots of them." Then she told the young man upon what floors of her own house he would find those who were in the worst need. He went from room to room. In some of those rooms the men and the women who were starving would not touch his food because their neighbors were worse off than they. "It ain't that I'm above being helped," said one gaunt, haggard man, "but I've got enough ahead to keep me and mine in bread for one week more. If the strike ain't off by then, I'll take help and thank you; but there's worse off than we are now and they must be helped first." At last the young man returned to the landlady who had directed him among the starving, and bluntly said, "When did you eat anything last?" "Oh, I had something to eat day before yesterday. You know they cannot pay their rents now and I have to keep them." "But you never asked me for bread. Why not?" "Because," said the brave woman, "I know of some of them upstairs who have not a morsel of food for three days and I wanted you to help them first." Wherever that young man went during the London dock strike he found starving men and women thinking not so much for themselves as for others. So may we breathe forth our prayers. May we pray for others. May we plead for others. Like Paul, may we be able to say, "O God, for thy honor and glory may I live and may I die." Let us fill the six water-pots to the brim when we lift up our petitions to God.

Amplify your prayers. Make them big enough to take in the necessities of the whole human race. Do more than that. After you have prayed thus go forth with the confidence that God will answer your prayers upon a big scale. The trouble with a great many of us is that we pray big and then plan small. We lay out our designs for a St. Peter's, or a Milan, or a Seville Cathedral. Then we materialize our designs into mortar and brick by building a little meeting-house or a village church, or a roofless barn, or a hen-coop.

Faith in God's Power

One of the small cities of England wished to build a large cathedral. The citizens came to a famous London architect, and asked him to design one which would cost $1,000,000. After the elaborate design had been completed, the committee came back and asked the architect if he would cut down his design and build instead a church worth $75,000. With that the sarcastic architect said: "Gentlemen, cannot you make it fifty shillings more so we can throw in a fine spire?" So some of us in our prayers have been petitioning God for a St. Peter's Cathedral. We have laid out our prayers upon the most elaborate scale. We have asked for the conversion of the world. We have pleaded for the emancipation of the human race from the tyranny of sin. We have asked for everything we ought to be asked for. But when it comes to filling up the water-pots to the brim, we say: "What is the use? If we can get God to answer our prayers a thimbleful, that is all we have a right to expect." We ask for a cathedral; then we are satisfied to plan for a village meeting-house or a little mud hut. Now, my friends, you have no right to ask God for big things, unless you at the same time go forward in triumphant faith, planning to work out your prayers, expecting God to answer your petitions in due time.

"The great trouble with some people," said a famous speaker I once heard, "is this: They ask God for a certain blessing; they declare that they make their petitions in good faith; then, after they arise from their knees, they never expect God to answer their prayers. Now, when I was in the army, I ran out of money. I had to have a certain amount to meet necessary expenses. So I wrote home to my father and told him my needs. I told him what I wanted. I knew he would send me that money, because what I wanted was right to have, and my father was financially able to meet my wants. So I wrote to my father to send the money to a certain postoffice, as I expected to be there in about three weeks. Upon the faith which I had in my father I went ahead and supplied my necessities, and when I arrived at the postoffice, I got my money as I expected. Now, that is the way we should look to God. We should believe in him. We should ask great things of him. And then we should go forth in simple faith, expecting that he will answer our prayers." No man ever spoke truer words than these.

Basis of Great Deeds

The more I pondered upon this part of my subject the more I remembered that the greatest workers for Jesus Christ have been men who had no financial capital save their faith. They lived in one sense up to the last cent of their income. They prayed for big things and then having deliberately and calmly made up their minds that God wanted them to undertake big things they went ahead and built their hospitals and started their reformatory movements, and their money came when it was needed, as the manna of the wilderness came day by day, to feed the Israelites when they Brooklyn children were not left out during the feast good things, but after dinner they went on to Luna k, where they were given the freedom of the miniature city for the rest of the day, while the Manhattantes remained in Dreamland.

Long streamers of ribbon fastened to the childrens' shoulders admitted them to all the shows of the island resorts. They shot the chutes, they rode in the airships, they slid down the bumps, occasionally taking a trip through the Bay of Naples or a tour through the mimic Switzerland by way of variety. There were the "Kansas Cyclone" and "The Days of Forty-Nine" to enchant the excited throng of merry-makers, who scarcely knew which way to turn, so numerous were the novel pleasures at their command. All other attractions paled, however, before the wonderful trained animals; many and earnest were the discussions as to which was prime favorite, the hen that rode a horse in the arena, or the big elephant that walked over the dwarf. The kicking mule, "Dynamite," settled all disputes by making his appearance and carrying ninety per cent. of the children's votes as the greatest wonder they ever beheld. In response to the ringing applause from those 2,000 young throats, the management indulgently consented to put "Dynamite" in the arena no less than ten times before the youngsters became reconciled to his final disappearance.

Children of New York's Orphan Asylums Motoring to Coney Island

Nothing was omitted that could add to the charm of the festive day and shed unclouded brightness upon the flying hours. Peanuts, popcorn, and "sweeties" dear to the children of palace or cottage — were freely distributed, and photographs of the wide-eyed, laughing multitude were taken. It seemed as if the hosts of the day were determined that for once, at least, every one of that great company of boys and girls should forget every detail of their somewhat drab and formal institution life, and should revel without restraint in their rare holiday.

After having drunk their cup of joy to the dregs, and exhausted every form of entertainment which the big amusement resorts had to offer, 2,000 tired but happy children were taken back to their homes, a few stragglers being identified at the last moment by their gorgeous ribbon tags, and stowed away contentedly in the already overflowing motor cars. The owners of the cars were able to reflect that they had passed a well-spent day, devoted to loving service in behalf of the destitute and the fatherless.

re on their way to the Promised Land. Some time o there came into my possession a book with this ggestive title: Tales of Trust. It is written in the ecdotal style. There page after page is filled with the swers men have received to their prayers. As I rned these leaves over I said to myself, "If all these ries are true, how negligent have I and other men en of this mighty power! One fact I know—if all e answers that God has sent to prayer had been itten down—if only the instances in which God me to the financial help of those who were doing big ings for him, because they had asked of him big ings—I suppose that even the world itself could not ntain the books that would be written."

Faith in Men

But not in prayer alone is a brimful Gospel faith cessary. We must have faith in the men and the men by whom we are surrounded if we would accomsh great things for His honor and glory. We must lieve that God can enter into the hearts of our ends and recreate them. Paul writes in one of his istles, "I can do all things through Christ who engtheneth me." Paul had a right to say that. I ve a right to say that about myself. And I o have a right to say that about every man, woman d child with whom I come in contact in daily life. w, there is no human power which will more quickly ke a man a useful servant of Jesus Christ than the ine faith which we have in our brothers and sisters t, through God, they can do all things.

But the great trouble with our attempt to reclaim n is this: When men and women start to do wrong, en they begin to wander down into the paths of sin, e world loses faith in these sinners. When these ners try to come back to the straight paths of purity d truth, the world fights them back and turns toward em the cold shoulder of indifference and doubt. And after the world loses faith in a man, then the time is not far distant when that man will lose faith in himself, and then—God pity him! For, with a jump, he will leap over the precipice of despair. Oh, faith, thou mighty faith, thou faith by which Abel sacrificed and Enoch walked and Abraham went forth into an unknown land to find an inheritance for his children; oh, faith, thou mighty faith, by which Joseph ruled and Moses led the children of Israel forth from their Egyptian bondage and with which Joshua rocked down the Jericho walls; oh, faith, thou mighty faith, with which Peter and James and Mary Magdalene bended the knee to worship Christ; oh, faith, thou mighty, divine faith, shall we not lay hold of thee, and through the power of the Holy Spirit save our fallen fellow men for God?

Did I say that all the world would lose its faith in a man after a man has sinned seven times seven? Yes, I said that, but I must make one exception. There is always one human being who will never lose faith in us when we have done wrong, and that is our mother. That is the reason why the Christian mother's love is the most potent of all loves for the salvation of a sinner. The mother's faith will not give her children up, and that is the reason why they win so many of their wayward children for Christ. The warden of one of our prominent State penitentiaries a few years ago was asked if the prisoners' friends, as a rule, continued to visit them. "No," was the reply; "they are usually men who have been a scourge and disgrace to their families. It is a relief to be rid of them. Their friends, their wives and even their children make one or two perfunctory visits at first, and then give them up. In the course of a year or two, they are forgotten by all, as if they were in their coffins, except by their mothers. Their mothers always come and keep coming, and try to influence me in their behalf. No matter how black-dyed in crime a ruffian may be, his mother will know some good point to tell me of him. She never wholly loses her faith in him." Is not that, O man, the history of our lives? Is not one of the greatest powers by which we may win men to the Cross of Jesus Christ the mother-faith in our hearts? Oh that by the grace of God we could all have a mother's faith in those who are treading the path of sin! Would that in the name of Jesus Christ we could cling to men, and keep clinging to men, until we could see them transformed by the power of the Holy Ghost! Brother, increase your faith in your brother man. See men in Gospel vision transformed, redeemed and cleansed of sin by Jesus' atoning blood. Fill up your water-pots to the brim.

A Present Faith

But lastly, I remark that we should have a faith brimful enough to believe that God can as readily answer our prayers to-day, this hour, if we will only ask him, as he can answer them next month, or next year, or in the dim future after we are dead. Those servants who filled the water-pots did not suppose that Jesus was going to turn that water into wine by slow fermentation, so that it could be bottled and stored away in the cellars. What they wanted was wine at once. Thus, as God can answer the prayers of his people at once if he will, can there be any better time for us to ask for an increase in our faith than just now? Have you the kind of faith which I have been describing? Do you ask big things from God? After you ask big things, are you willing to go forward expecting that he will answer your requests? And have you faith that Christ can redeem your dear ones, no matter how low they may be sunken in the quagmire of sin, as well as cleanse your own sinful heart until it becomes white as the driven snow? Do you believe he will do all this if you ask him now, even now, just now? Jesus saith unto them: "Fill up the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim." Will you even now expect a divine blessing which comes from a brimful faith?

DELEGATES TO THE WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION HOLDING A CHRISTIAN SERVICE IN THE COLISEUM, ROME

THE great Coliseum in Rome is a monument of the past which is unequaled in magnitude save by the Pyramids alone. The external elevation consisted of four stages adorned with columns of three orders of Greek architecture, with many arches. There were eighty entrances in the lower story. The interior was divided into the arena proper (which was the place assigned to combatants, being strewn with sand to absorb the blood during gladiatorial contests) and the cavea, which was assigned to the spectators. Around the arena was a strong iron

Connected with the arena were the rooms of the gladiators and the dens from which the animals were released. Occasionally, as some ancient writers assert, the arena was flooded with water after the gladiatorial show was ended. Mimic naval battles were fought with triremes, vessels propelled by oarsmen, the combatants being on the upper deck.

In the cavea, the places of honor were in the lowest galleries, and in these sat the emperor, the senators, chief magistrates, women of social rank and persons of [illegible] Enormous multitudes were often packed together here for many hours at a time. Some writers have estimated that as many as 90,000 persons could be admitted to these great spectacles.

This place, in which the delegates to the World's Sunday School Convention held a Gospel service, has been the scene of many Christian martyrdoms. It was eminently fitting that such a gathering should be held there as a tribute to the early sufferers for the faith, and to [illegible] of old Rome sought to crush out forever.

bought a Bible; it was the only Bible in all that village, when weary at the loom he took down his Bible and read it and then, at their simple dinner, he told his wife and children what he had read and they talked about it. It was home department work, with no teacher and no preacher save the father who was searching for light. Two years ago this month, I saw that Bible in the city of Cleveland, Ohio—an old Bible without cover eel, not only as an Italian, but as a member of the me Sunday School in which I have always worked ce I have been a little girl, and in which I have al- ys been greatly interested."

It was quickly discovered that the young lady's her, General Ricciotti Garibaldi, was in the audience, d after repeated calls he arose and said: "In seeing s wonderful gathering from all parts of the earth, it to me, the old soldier for the freedom of my country, source of profound satisfaction, because we have anged the bullet into the Bible with its holy fea- res. We men have formed the unity of our country litically and geographically; it is to you to form the ity of Italy morally." These words were greeted by new outburst of applause, concluded by three cheers r the Garibaldis.

The American Ambassador to Italy, Hon. Lloyd riscom, received a hearty ovation from the Conven- on. In a few well-chosen words he, too, welcomed e delegates to the Eternal City.

Before the meeting concluded still another surprise as given to the Convention through the reading by resident Warren of a cordial message from President heodore Roosevelt, which was as follows: "Pray xpress the assurance of my hearty good will to those ngaged in giving a world character to organized unday School work. All good citizens must cordially mpathize with the effort to secure for the children of ll countries, for those who will come after us and in creed, who disinterestedly and in a spirit alike of common sense and devotion to duty thus seek to train the future generation in the things of the spirit no less than in the things of the body."

It was deemed fitting that a telegram should be sent to his Majesty the King of Italy. The following message was accordingly sent: "The Fifth World's Convention of Sunday Schools, whose every energy is consecrated to the moral and religious education of the young, on initiating its labors sends to his Majesty the King its fervid and respecful salutation, and invokes the divine blessing on all the royal family." Later in the Conference the King responded: "His Majesty the King has accepted your kind salutation and that of all the delegates, and in return he sends thanks for their noble thought."

Perhaps the most inspiring and valuable feature of the entire Congress was the survey of Sunday School conditions throughout the world given by the delegates from the various lands. In a number of Latin countries the Sunday School movement is still in a weak and struggling condition, and numerous pathetic and stirring incidents were given of the difficulties of the workers in those lands and of the victories achieved after long-continued toil. A striking example of home department work was given the Convention by Dr. A. W. Clark, of Prague, Bohemia. He said:

"A few years ago a Bible colporteur went to a Bohemian village; one man in that village, a weaver, and well worn—and the oldest son of that household told me this story: 'This Bible has changed the character of our family. We are eight children; we were born in darkness; this book, blessed of God, saved my parents and saved us eight children. Where are we to-day? I am pastor of a Bohemian church in Cleveland, Ohio; my brother is pastor of a Bohemian church in Minnesota; a third brother is a professor in a Christian school, and a fourth secretary of a Y. M. C. A. work. The sisters are Bible readers; indeed, the whole family, we eight children, are all devoting our time and talent to the work of God, and this old Bible, without cover, was the beginning of that glorious work.'"

It was a dark-skinned Spaniard, Pastor Albrecias, with a big mustache and a fierce countenance, looking as though he might well be a descendant of the Spanish buccaneers, who made, through the medium of an interpreter, one of the most stirring five-minute addresses of the Convention, telling of the difficulties he had to contend with in that benighted country. He evoked frequent applause. He said: "The enemies of the Gospel say that Spain will never become evangelical, and unfortunately the success of the Gospel cause in Spain up to the present has not been very great. For this reason we need to work fervently among the young. There are at present about one hundred Sunday Schools in Spain with about 6,500 scholars.

Rome's Great Convention

EVER memorable will be the great Convention in Rome of Sunday School workers, a description of which is published in another part of this issue. Most impressive was the fact that in the Eternal City, where Paul lived and suffered, where the Cæsars reigned, where Nero once issued his orders for the butchery of the Christians, and where the Popes denounced and condemned the Protestants, should have been held this great Convention of the men and women who are preparing the next generation for future triumphs. Right in the centre of old Rome, on the soil consecrated by the blood of the martyrs, on the very stones whence they were thrown to savage beasts, in the Coliseum itself, these Christian men and women stood and sang the triumphant song, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," like soldiers on a battlefield celebrating the victory of the Divine Captain. Perished are the Cæsars and the empire they founded, but the name of the Nazarene they despised and crucified lives on, greater and more revered as the centuries pass. Would that "the saints in Cæsar's household" could have looked down from their seats in glory at that spectacle in the Coliseum!

Not less suggestive, if less romantic, were the meetings of the Convention in the Methodist Episcopal Church in Rome. That assembly of fifteen hundred men and women was in itself a notable fact. Coming from all lands, animated by one purpose, inspired by one spirit, they must have been cheered and encouraged by the association. There could have been no strangers in that assembly, for even those who met others of different race and different language were brought near to one another by the presence of a little child. It is a great work in which they are engaged. What the world will be half a century hence depends, under God, on the fidelity with which they are doing their work to-day. We most fervently pray that their visit to the scene of Christianity's early trials may strengthen them for their weekly duties and cheer them with renewed faith.

Our New Serial Story

IT seems as if there was no other period of the history of Europe so full of interesting events as that which covers the last quarter of the seventeenth century. Dynasties rose and fell; great wars were waged; heroic men and women gave their all, their lives when need be, for their religious beliefs, as freely as did the martyrs who met their death in the days of the early church; and through it all, against the black smoke of burning cities, ran the many threads of that romance which has always been present where there have been brave men and fair women.

In our issue of July 17, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will give to its readers the opening chapters of a new serial story that deals graphically with this interesting period—a story that deals not only with exciting and thrilling events in the Old World, but also with life in the New. The author, Isabella Macfarlane, who has already achieved no small fame in literature, has placed the first part of her story in the quaint medieval city of Rochelle, in France—a city that for years was one of the great strongholds of the Protestant faith, and from whose walls the armies of the French kings several times withdrew in inglorious defeat.

The time is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which had guaranteed protection to the Protestants of France. The revocation exiled thousands of the best blood of the land to England, to the Low Countries and to far America. The fortunes of the Huguenot family and its friends, from the heroic old grandmother and the gentle pastor who lived like a hunted animal among the swamps, to the sweet heroine Gabrielle, "the flower of New Rochelle," are depicted with great skill and hold the reader spell-bound to the end.

The fleeing refugees from Old Rochelle founded, it will be remembered, the beautiful town of New Rochelle on Long Island Sound, where, free from the terror of the bloody persecution known as the "dragonades," they built themselves homes as near as possible like those they had left behind in their own fair land. Their existence here in America, for a time, was no less interesting than in France. The families they founded made strong their mark on our colonial life and that of the early days of independence.

Gabrielle, we believe, will take her place as one of the most charming heroines of fiction that have appeared on the pages of any book for many a day. To trace her story or more than hint at the intricate plot would unkindly forestall the pleasure of our readers; they should follow her fortunes for themselves.

Christ in Character

MANY of our readers, we find, are grappling with the problems involved in the personality of Jesus. That he should have been one with the Father, yet should have prayed to him; that he should have acknowledged that there was at least one thing that he did not know, and that he should have said to the man who came to him calling him good, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is, God." Satisfactory answers can be given to these difficulties, but after all, they are not the questions that most vitally concern us. Mere metaphysics cannot bring us into that relation to Jesus which transforms our lives and characters.

It is as the revelation of God to men that Jesus came into the world. The world did not know God and could not conceive of him. The idols that men made and worshiped, showed that they were blindly trying to understand him. They could understand his power, his majesty, his sternness, but the character was not complete. Jesus came and taught them to say "Our Father." That completely changed the aspect in which God stood to his creatures. But Jesus did more than this. He showed men the character of God by his own life. The gentleness that attracted the children, the kindness and thoughtfulness that provided for the tired multitude, and the patience with which he bore the taunts and mockeries of his enemies, were the materials out of which he would have us build up our conception of the Father. It was all so superhuman that we wonder at Philip's request, "Show us the Father." Jesus had been showing the Father all the time, if Philip's eyes had not been so blind. But the Master was patient with his dull scholar: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," was the plain answer that satisfied Philip and should satisfy us.

Better than an intellectual perception of the relation is that practical conduct involved in the command he addressed to his disciples, "Follow me." If we do that, the intellectual difficulties disappear. A popular novelist pictures an atheist becoming a humble believer, and on being asked what had changed him, pointing to a man who had helped him in his poverty and degradation, visited him in sickness and stood by him in disgrace. "I have seen God in that man," he said, "and I cannot help believing in God now." Ah, if we could live such lives, if we could become so like Christ that others might see God in us, we would be more useful than if we could solve every difficulty that the sceptics raise.

The Power of Conscience

THAT an awakened conscience is able to bring the worst of sinners to his knees, and to wring from him in open confession the awful secrets of a life of crime, is once more illustrated in the great trial which is now in progress at Boise, Idaho. Harry Orchard, the self-confessed gambler, ore-thief, bigamist, incendiary and wholesale assassin, after astounding the whole community by his revelations of wickedness, has now told what led him to make his extraordinary confession. There came an hour in his life of crime, he said, when the voice of conscience spoke. It brought before him in a moment the crimes of years. He saw his sins as a mountain before his eyes. He could get no rest, night or day. He felt that divine forgiveness was hopeless for him.

"When I first thought of confessing," he said, "I did not believe that I could get the forgiveness of God. I had been too bad, I thought, for that. After I read the Bible for a while, I began to believe that if I really repented I would be forgiven. From that moment until now I have never hesitated about the course I was to pursue. I did not care what became of myself. I wanted to die, and I felt it a duty I owed to society, to God and myself to confess my crimes."

Orchard does not claim to be a converted man. He has taken one important step in the right direction—apparently the first in his long life of evil deeds. The arch-criminal, wincing under the lash of conscience, feels the heavy burden of his guilt. Who shall say that the same power which saved the thief on the cross may not yet pluck this wretched man as a brand from the burning—a convincing illustration to the whole world of the grace that "saves to the uttermost"?

"All Buford cargo now dispatched by vans inland, a by junks up canal. Fleet of fifty-four junks fully loade Fevers terribly prevalent. Missionaries almost exhauste Canal trip shows that reports of famine were not exag gerated. Relief afforded from all sources has saved on million lives. I have interviewed Viceroy Tuan Fang Nanking. He expressed high appreciation of America kindness, and spoke of good feeling existing betwee two countries. E. R. JOHNSTONE."

This result of the relief work immeasurably excels a expectations, and shows with what lavish hand Go blesses the simplest acts of kindness and self-sacrifice Under divine blessing the relief movement attained volume and momentum that penetrated all the famin region. It became the means of rescue to multitude whose case was thought to be hopeless.

God never does things by halves. His work is alway complete. In India the relief campaign was followe by a great revival. A similar sequel may be looked fo in China. The same omnipotent hand that saved th body can save the soul also. And if even a fraction o the million rescued from physical death be brought int the Gospel light, it will be an especial cause of rejoicin among the Christians of America, and among all wh have shared with them this work of benevolence these last four months.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST C. H. YATMAN is conducting Gospel meetings at Pittston, Pa., where he is speaking to large audiences.

—REV. C. C. POTTER, with his mission boat Glad Tidings, is doing good service along the waterways in the vicinity of Des Moines, Ia.

—REV. WESLEY W. GRAHAM, who died recently at Duncan, Ky., was one of the oldest ministers in the country and had preached sixty years without pay. He was born ninety-five years ago.

—ONE OF THE most potent influences for good at present in Jerusalem is the London Jews' Society. During the past eighty years since the beginning of its work, over 800 Jews and their descendants have been baptized and received into the Christian Church through it. In addition to a strong corps of earnest clergy, there is a House of Industry, which includes training in carpentry, in turnery, in printing, and a dispensary. This Society is preparing for a great Palestine exhibition during 1907 in one of the largest halls in London, with the desire to arouse a greater interest in the Palestine of to-day.

Progress on the Isthmus

HOW the gigantic task of cutting the great interoceanic waterway at Panama is being performed is a mystery to many people who know the difficulties to be overcome. Not a few have the idea that the work is being done by a vast number of men laboring with pick and shovel. The picture on this page, representing one of the machines employed, shows the superiority of modern methods to that primitive means. The digging machine, with its giant hands armed with four great steel nails, tears away nearly a truck load of material at a single effort. The controller, by a touch of the powerful machinery, swings it clear and tilts it deftly into the waiting wagon. With such helpers it is not difficult to understand how the rate of digging has risen from a few thousand cubic yards a month to eight hundred thousand. The prediction that the entire work may be finished in eight years, at first received with incredulity, now appears to be within the bounds of possibility.

The most encouraging feature of the work is the sanitary condition. So thoroughly was the cleaning up of the Isthmus done under the direction of Dr. W. C. Gorgas that the route is now exceptionally healthy, and the death rate among both whites and blacks is below that of many parts of the United States. The region had been a by-word for unhealthiness, but the methods applied so successfully in Cuba were similarly effective on the Isthmus. Yellow fever has almost disappeared, pneumonia is now rare and less malignant, and malaria is much less prevalent than was expected on the line of a work of the character of the canal in a tropical climate. It is in this chiefly, and in the character of the machinery, that the American work surpasses that previously done by the French, and the result justifies the foresight of beginning operations with the sanitary conditions. The fact of so much of the labor being done by West Indian negroes, with the difficulty of exercising thorough supervision over them, and their incapacity of realizing the necessity of sanitary precautions for their own protection, still constitutes a serious problem, requiring constant vigilance.

Thus, after being agitated at intervals for nearly five hundred years, the project appears to be nearing realization. The route is practically that first selected and endorsed by M. de Lesseps. That it is the most practicable route, in spite of the locks necessitated by the greater elevation at Culebra and by the variation in the range of tide on the Panama side, is now generally admitted. It will not be the ideal canal, but it can be built with comparative speed, and it will serve the purpose. The use that will be made of it, through its shortening the ocean voyage between our eastern and western coasts by about nine thousand miles, will doubtless lead to its enlargement. That there will also be a large foreign traffic through it is certain. No captain will spend time in rounding Cape Horn, when he can pass through the canal in about twelve hours. With its completion, another step will be taken in removing natural obstacles to easy and rapid communication among the peoples of the world, and a significant feature of it is that it will be for peaceful communication only. The canal is never to be used for the purposes of war. In another sense than that of the prophet, his words are being fulfilled:

Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people. (Isaiah 62 : 10.)

The Giant Hand of the Great Crane at the Panama Canal

A Fight with an Eagle

A newspaper at Colorado Springs, Col., reports a remarkable accident to a citizen of that town. He had observed an eagle's nest on the side of a precipitous cliff and inferred from the movements of the eagle that there were young birds in the nest. The rock was in the North Cheyenne Canyon and was almost perpendicular. The crevice in which the nest appeared to be was about 600 feet from the valley, and about 180 feet from the summit. The only way of reaching it was to descend by a rope from the top. He secured the rope safely and let himself down. Looking into the crevice he saw the nest, and reaching over got possession of two of the little eaglets. He was beginning to ascend when the mother bird swooped down upon him. He drew a pistol and fired at her, but his aim was baffled by the eagle's violent attack, and the pistol was knocked out of his hand. He defended himself as well as he could, but the clawing of the eagle and the swaying of his body was too much for the rope; it snapped, and the man rolled down the side of the cliff. Fortunately for him a projecting ledge saved him from falling to the bottom. The eagle renewed her attack on him there once more and he was glad to release his prey to save his life. He waited on the ledge, badly bruised, until help came. He is not the first man who has thought it easy to gain some coveted possession and has unexpectedly found his life imperiled by the attempt. Unhappily there are some who, to gain it, put their souls in peril and cling to their prise to their eternal loss.

Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his, and to him that ladeth himself with thick clay! Shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee? (Hab. 2 : 6, 7.)

A Fatal Horoscope

A workingman in New York has voluntarily fulfilled the prediction of an astrologer. He was a steady, respectable man, intelligent, but with a tendency to faith in occult predictions. Some time last year he sent to Stamford, Conn., to ask an astrologer to cast his horoscope. He probably felt some shame about admitting his superstition, so he did not confide the fact of his application to his friends. Early this year the Stamford seer mailed to him the result of his calculations of the stellar signs. He read it and brooded over it, but did not disclose it to any one. His acquaintances, however, noticed that he was greatly depressed. They rallied him about it, suggesting reasons for his low spirits, but he could not be cheered. On May 30 he was missing from his work and his usual haunts, and the people with whom he boarded had not seen him. Finally, the door of his room was broken open, and it was found that he had committed suicide. On the wall, where he had suspended it, was the horoscope, which stated that on May 30 some dire calamity would befall him. The dupe had not even waited to see what "the dire calamity" would be, or whether there would be any calamity. He might have lived on if he had heeded the warning of the prophet:

Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of the heavens. (Jer. 10: 2.)

A Crime That Was a Blunder

Since the recent death of Pobiedonostseff, the Procurator of the Holy Synod of Russia, new light has been shed on the struggles of the Russian people. An examination of his papers shows that the constitution so ardently desired for so many years and so firmly withheld by the late Czar Alexander III. had actually been granted by that Czar's father and predecessor. That potentate, who won immortal fame by liberating all the Russian serfs, had carefully thought out a plan for giving a large share of the government to his people. He had studied the constitutions of England and other constitutional countries, and had decided on the character of a measure adapted to the genius of the Russian people. The instrument had been formally drawn up and was waiting his signature when he was cruelly assassinated. Pobiedonostseff's papers show that he had always been opposed to the measure, and when Alexander II. was dead he went to his son, Alexander III., and persuaded him not to grant the concession. Never was such a blunder committed as that assassination. If the murderers had allowed Alexander II. to live, Russia would have been twenty-six years ago in possession of the representative government that it has been all those years struggling to gain. The Russian patriots actually defeated their own purposes by destroying the man who was preparing to grant the boon they sought.

Your iniquities have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you. (Jer. 5: 25.)

A Record Fine

Probably the largest fine ever inflicted in any court in the world was inflicted by Judge Brooks of Austin, Tex., early this month. He pronounced sentence on an oil company doing business in Texas, requiring it to pay a fine of more than a million and a half dollars. He said that even so large a fine as that was merciful, as he might have sentenced the company to pay three and a half millions. The charge against the company was for violating the anti-trust laws, by maintaining an agreement in restraint of trade, and to fix and maintain the price of a commodity. The judge who pronounced sentence had had a defendant company before him for the same offense nine years ago and had ousted it from the State. The company had thereupon dissolved and organized anew. The judge held that it was practically the same company, or if not the same, was doing business on similar principles and committing the same offense. The legal advisers of the company believe they will have no difficulty in having the decision reversed by the United States Supreme Court, but in the meantime the fine stands as an exemplary punishment. If the allegations of the prosecution are true, the company is working a double wrong, ruining its competitors and oppressing the public. Men who do that deserve exemplary punishment.

Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there is no place, that they may dwell alone in the midst of the land! (Isa. 5 : 8, R.V.)

MONT-LAWN INVITES THE CHILDREN

AND THE LITTLE FOLKS ARE EAGER FOR THE COMING OF THE OPENING DAY

ON the 28th of June, 1907, the day when all the public schools of Greater New York close their books for the summer, Mont-Lawn, the Children's Paradise, joyfully welcomes the first instalment of the tenement children who most need its gracious ministrations. Through the years of its existence, it has fared steadily on, growing in comfort, space and beauty—eradicating such elements as experience has wisely indicated, adding buildings for rest, for refreshment, for recreation and for worship. Last summer, when the new and spacious Temple Cottage Dormitory first stood in artistic perfection in the rear of its namesake, and the well-appointed dining-hall, with its spacious second-floor playroom, replaced the more primitive tent of other days, it seemed as if the "last word" had been spoken.

But an original and delightful innovation awaits the little ones upon their arrival this year. Not only has the rambling hillside pasture been cleared of all obstructive underbrush, but the genii of the waters have been invoked. Where heretofore there wound a steep grass-grown path beneath the low-swaying branches of the old orchard, there now purls and ripples a limpid silver brooklet, its pebbly bed full of entrancing allurement to the tired and dusty feet of the child-wayfarers from the slums. What frolics are in store for the brook and its play-fellows! What rare pleasure for the pavement-tired feet to lave in the sparkling rill! Oh, surely—

"If Eden be on earth at all,
'Tis that which we the country call."

Little Mont-Lawn Guests Boarding the Cars at the Bible House

These weeks of June have been busy ones at Mont-Lawn. The capacity for fresh water has been extensively increased; the ground about the new buildings, which last year no artifices could prevent from looking crude and bare after the carpenters had gathered up their chips and departed, is now clothed with velvety, emerald verdure, which leaves no spot to offend the eye, wherever it may turn. Within the hospitably open doors all is in speckless order. The windows glitter as they catch the radiance of the setting sun; the rows upon rows of plump and spotless beds are as snowy and inviting as of yore. Above those quiet cots, which seem to whisper of the prayerful memories of mother-love which have placed many of them there, hang the gift cards, inscribed either with the name of the giver, or with the infinitely more precious name of the loved one for whose sake the giver's heart goes out to all childhood. As she surveys it all, the house-mother of twelve years' standing breathes a tired sigh of satisfaction and says, "I never saw Mont-Lawn so beautiful before. How the children will enjoy it!"

On the broad prairies of the West and in the picturesque North of our sister, Canada; on New England's "rock-bound coast," and in the land of the sunny South, many have thus early heard and answered the "call of the wild" which rises with insistent clamor within the breast of the tenement child, with the coming of summer in her most unlovely guise to the dismal courts and alleys. A mourning mother, "sustained by an unfaltering trust" in the prospect of a blessed reunion with her beloved boy, has testified to the tender love which lives on within her heart by sending a perpetual endowment of one of Mont-Lawn's fresh white beds.

Think what such an endowment means! Week after week, year after year, until the years have rolled themselves into a generation, through the long, bright summer hours, through the fragrant nights under the quiet stars, one little child after another will "rejoice and be exceeding glad" because that lonely mother heart in the old Bay State took thought for the weal of New York City's tenement childhood. One little figure after another which has learned all too early to bow before "the heat and burden of the day" will tire itself in the unaccustomed sports of normal childhood upon the grassy slopes of Mont-Lawn; will refresh itself with wholesome fare from the bountiful table; will sit reverently within the Temple reared to the Saviour of little children, and at last will creep into its cool nest and sink to dreamless sleep, with the fair white card at its head bearing the simple words, "In perpetual memory of William ——, from his mother."

We want to extend our work; we want to reach more of the little ones who need us, and we believe that the most direct and efficient way of doing this is to ask our friends and co-workers for more cot endowments. The extent of the work at Mont-Lawn is only limited by the means at command. Last year, through the generosity of the friends and patrons of the children, over 2,000 children, who came from homes of extreme and bitter poverty, were provided with a happy outing of ten days each. This year we are ambitious to say "yes" to more of the wistful little applicants whom we have had to reject in times gone by.

The season is here. What shall we do to mark it in red letters for some poor tenement child? Twenty-one dollars endows a cot for the whole season. Three dollors sends a poor mite to Mont-Lawn for ten long, happy days. As heretofore, every contribution, however small, to our Children's Fresh Air Work will be acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE

By KATE UPSON CLARK

IF fifty of our wisest contemporaries should be asked: "What is the touchstone of civilization?" it is likely that more than half of them would answer: "The value which is placed upon human life."

One of the most beautiful and significant of the Scripture characterizations of the millennium is that then a man shall be "more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir."

The belief in immortality, which has been one of the most beneficent fruits of Christianity, so thoroughly permeates all ranks of society that it has done much to bring about this millennial view. During these later years, even science has condescended to give to this belief almost the support of what it calls "the exact proof." It seems to be admitted by scientists that since evolution has brought human beings up to so advanced a stage, therefore we may reasonably conclude that there are still higher conditions awaiting him. This is a great concession. It ought to help on the faith in immortality.

The shocking prevalence of suicide during the past two years has given pause to the world's confidence in its progress upward. Is it because the fear of future punishment has been lessened by the new gospel of love, that men have rushed so madly to self-destruction? Or has our wonderful prosperity, with its accompanying growth in luxury, so like the splendor of old Rome, led to the vice of old Rome?

We call Rome pagan. Its greatest sect was the Stoic, and all of the Stoic writers glorified suicide. We think of suicide as belonging distinctly to a bygone time and a creed outworn. It has nothing in common with the spirit of Christianity or the earnest, brave preaching and teaching of our foremost ethicists; yet here it is, carrying off before our faces not one nor a dozen, but scores of our educated men and women.

Not long ago, a college graduate was arguing in a thoughtful company in favor of suicide. He insisted that it was the best course for a large proportion of the unhappy and the unsuccessful. Not one of the seven or eight others present upheld him, and this was encouraging—but that he should dare deliberately to champion such a cause was in itself disquieting. The existence of "suicide clubs" is another shocking sign of degeneracy. There are plenty of other indications that Christian men and women may well fortify themselves and raise their voices clearly against any further license or laxity in the matter.

No doubt there are thousands of heavy-hearted ones among us who would be glad to join beloved friends who have departed. There are few of the afflicted who have not had moods of bitter longing to go hence, and have prayed for release. But such moods pass, with a brave and noble soul, and the prayer becomes one for endurance until the end, and for courage to take up the Master's work, wherever it may lie.

The cowardice of suicide should alone be enough to deter from it any one with a spark of pride or self-respect. To admit so cravenly that one is defeated, is the most humiliating thing that one can do. Then think of the friends left behind—their shame, their bewilderment. If crime is at the root of the matter, this horrible act doubles it. If it is merely the sorrow which is common to all mankind, one feels that the lessons of life have indeed been poorly learned. Whatever the motive, the legacy of disgrace left behind is a hard and bitter one for every relative and friend, especially for sons and daughters. The crass selfishness, the brutal cowardice, of the suicide are monstrous.

It is undoubtedly true that the love of life is stronger in some natures than in others and in some races than in others. It is characteristic of the healthier and stronger peoples that they cling most to life; and it is counted a mark of degeneracy that a general tendency to suicide should develop.

"Love not thy life," says the poet. Claudio's contemptible clinging to his represents the one extreme; the suicide, the other. Life is but a tool which has been given us for a purpose. We have no right to love it overmuch. Neither have we a right to lay it down, until he who gave it so bids us. The command to "commit no murder" applies as fully to one's own life as to that of others. We may lay our lives on the altar of our country; we may sacrifice them to save others; but we may not throw them idly aside, because we are tired, or sick, or unhappy.

The usual excuse when this is done is that the man is beside himself—therefore irresponsible. It is a dangerous plea.

Let no one even for an instant endure the contemplation of suicide. It is the duty of every Christian to denounce and condemn it. It is a reversion to paganism, and an insult to our pure and noble religion.

Questions and Answers

F. J. B., Compton, Que. Will OUR MAIL-BAG settle a dispute as to what country is richest in its variety of gems?

Queensland, Australia, is declared by competent authorities to contain a greater variety of precious and semi-precious stones than any other country in the world. Among those which have been authenticated are found practically the entire catalogue of known gems, including a number of very rare examples.

C. M. K., Denver, Col. What is the meaning of the description of death in II. Sam. 14: 14?

It was merely an eloquent reminder to David, by the woman whom Joab sent to him, that though a king he would have to die, and that what deeds of mercy he would do should be done at once. She went on to show that as God was merciful and provided means by which his banished might return, so should David be merciful to Absalom and recall him. Her own story and David's reply to it showed that in principle he had condemned himself. The sequel showed that Joab had better have left the matter alone.

This note from "Interested Reader" may appeal to those interested in floriculture:

With regard to changing the color of flowers (discussed in the MAIL-BAG), I have performed the wonder in a very simple way. I had two varieties of columbine, one bearing a double flower of a pale blue, and the other a purple flower (dark) being single. I removed all the pollen from the double flower and replaced it with that from the single one, and the plants raised from the seed produced blossoms of a beautiful dark blue, with a purple tinge, and very double. I never tried any other plants, but think it could be done with any that bear seed like the columbine.

L. R. A., San Jose, Calif. Is a person sent into the world to perform some definite mission, which, if unfulfilled, leaves life a failure, or is he sent to do the work that comes to his hand, of whatever kind it is?

To answer your question, one needs to be in the confidence of the Supreme Being. We do not see how any one can know whether he has a special mission or not. His duty is to do the thing nearest at hand, or the thing that may be opened for him at a distance. It may be to teach in a Sunday School or to go as a missionary to the heathen. His own talents and his circumstances have to decide the matter. The duty is generally made clear to the man who places himself in God's hands, to be used as he sees fit. Prayer to be divinely directed is always answered.

E. S. H., Norway, Me. 1. What do the Eskimo burn for fuel in their snow houses? 2. How do the Indians catch fish, as they have no hooks? 3. How do Indians strike fire?

1. They burn whale oil, also driftwood when they can get it. 2. The Indians make hooks from bone for fishing. They also use nets. 3. By the use of flints, or more usually by twirling one piece of wood on another by a bowstring.

R. S., Groveland, Ill. 1. When does Halley's comet return, and how long will it be visible to the naked eye? 2. How often does it happen that there is a transit of Mercury across the sun's disk? 3. Of what value would the discovery of the North Pole be to science?

1. Halley's comet will appear again in 1910. I shall never forget, when a lad of thirteen, in 1835, happening to cast my eye heavenward, and seeing a bright comet with a long tail. That was my first independent discovery of a comet, the next being the brightest comet ever seen in modern times, viz., that of 1843. Not much can be said as to how bright it will appear or how long it will be visible to the naked eye, all depending on its configuration with the earth and sun, and also whether the moon will be present or absent at the critical time; and if present, whether she will be crescent, half, or full. 2. Transits of Mercury across the sun's face, as seen from the earth, occur quite often when compared with the infrequency of those of the planet Venus. During the nineteenth century, Mercury made thirteen transits, the last in that century on November 10, 1894. They never can happen except in the months of May and November, while those of Venus always occur in June and December. Those of Mercury occur on an average of a little less than eight years. 3. I do not know, but think not much. LEWIS SWIFT.

J. N. L., Ash Creek, S. D. 1. How much, besides the $50,000 in salary, is the President allowed to defray expenses? 2. What is meant by initiative and referendum?

1. The President has $25,000 a year to pay for his traveling expenses and those of the United States officials that must go with him whenever he takes a journey. The President is required by custom to entertain prominent guests of the nation, and give certain social functions at the White House, so that none who have held that position have been able to save much for their retirement. 2. Initiative, in a political sense, means a system whereby a certain number of people can introduce a bill in the Legislature, without its going through the hands of representatives or committees, as at present. Referendum means that a bill once passed by a legislative body should be again referred to the voters.

Home-making Class in a New York Public School

THE Public High Schools of New York City have, within a few years, included in their curriculum a new branch of study for girls, known as Domestic Science. The advantages of this instruction cannot be over-estimated. The three years' course of thorough training prepares the pupils to take their places in their own homes or elsewhere as capable housekeepers who can prepare appetizing meals, and, what is especially to be commended, who can utilize in dainty and palatable forms the "left-overs," which otherwise would find their way to the refuse can. Skilled instruction is also given in table service, all the little niceties of manner and custom being inculcated which should be familiar to hostess, guest and maid.

Reader, Canada. Are the class of people known as "the Oneida Community," a religious sect, and if so, what is their belief?

The Oneida Community, which settled at Oneida, N. Y., in 1848, is a community of Christian Socialists. They live in one large building, dress very plainly, have common ownership of property, and believe in celibacy, although marriage is permitted. They have often been criticised for their peculiar views.

M. E. E., ——. Did Jesus actually bear his cross?

He evidently started with it, but was not able to carry it. His agitation in Gethsemane had doubtless left him very weak and the scourging had still further reduced his powers, so that it was doubtful whether he would not die before reaching Calvary. The soldiers therefore seized Simon and compelled him to carry the cross after Jesus. John says explicitly (John 19: 17) "he bearing his cross went forth."

J. G. R., Altoona, Pa. Does the soul of man go to its reward at death, or does it wait for the resurrection of the body and the last judgment?

The question has been long disputed and there is no clear, definite statement that answers it in the Bible. We have to depend on inferences. John speaks (Rev. 6: 9) of seeing the souls of the martyrs in heaven. Christ also speaks (Luke 16: 23-28) of the rich man as being alive and conscious after death, while his brothers were living on the earth. So he could not have waited till the resurrection before going to his doom. He also told the penitent thief that he should be with him in Paradise that same day (Luke 23: 43). Another inference may be drawn from Paul's statement (Phil. 1: 23) that he had "a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better"—meaning, it is to be supposed, far better than laboring in the world. If he expected to lie in the grave till the resurrection, he would not have been likely to say that. He would have preferred to live and work. These are a few of the statements from which the inference is drawn that man goes immediately after death to his reward and does not wait for the resurrection. It is not clear that Paul expected a resurrection of the body at all. He expected to receive a new body (I. Cor. 15: 37)—not the body that was laid in the grave.

IN THE HOME FLOWER GARDEN

Artistic and Practical Gardening on a Small Scale for the Nature Lover

By Margaret E. Sangster

WOMEN have always been fond of flowers since that early day when Mother Eve helped Father Adam in taking care of the beautiful Garden of Eden. What the world's first mother did her daughters have ever since loved to do. Carl Hilty, in his delightfully suggestive volume, Steps of Life, has this to say concerning women and flowers:

"The character of women can very well be judged from their treatment of flowers. A girl that on her walk pulls as many flowers as possible for herself and has no desire to leave any behind for others has a tendency to greediness and pleasure-seeking. A lady who, after looking at a beautiful flower or bouquet for a short time, will permit it to lie and wither, instead of putting it in water, or of making some poor child happy with it, has no warm heart. But if she pulls flowers quite to pieces, she will some day no less unconcernedly deal with men who have put their trust in her."

There may be those who will think this appreciation of the German author a trifle exaggerated in statement, but I am of the opinion that he comes very near the truth. A woman who has sympathy with flowers as if they were sentient beings is likely to have a tender love for children and a kindly yearning for dumb animals, with a soft place in her heart in favor of the under dog. Indeed, I have known women apparently hard on the surface, who had a way with them that flowers knew and answered to, and by that sign I have been sure that there were depths of gentleness beneath the external crust.

The Poetry of the Garden

To many hard-working women whose lives are full of drudgery, the one strain of music, the one bit of poetry in the twelvemonth's round has been found in the garden. Acres for grain and a little strip for flowers, the latter close to the door, have been the rule near the farmer's home. If the man has not cared much for flowers he has tolerated them with an indulgent smile at his wife's weakness. Stories are told in the early settlements of this country of roses transplanted from Old England to New England gardens, and tulips brought from Holland to flourish in the new soil, as lilies are imported from Japan to-day. But until a recent period little attention has been paid to the artistic side of gardening when gardening must be done on a small scale. It is a good sign of the times that at present thousands of small gardens, under the intelligent hands of women, flourish and blossom and repay their owners by lavish and successive bloom from spring to autumn.

What Plants to Choose

A woman may have a hardy garden and plant it with perennials that from year to year thrive in sun and rain, requiring only occasional enrichment of the soil.

The Wild Garden

A Bed of Pansies

The Grace of the Crimson Rambler

Thus the crimson rambler with its wonderful grace and luxuriant blooming, once started, grows with the swiftness of Jack's famous bean-stalk. Well started, the rambler-rose puts forth one or two strong canes each summer, and its tendrils twine about the trellis and make the plainest home as charming as the most ornate mansion. Avoid the pink and yellow varieties and select the crimson if you can have only one rambler.

There are other quick-growing vines; the purple and white clematis and the climbing nasturtium have special qualities to recommend them; the latter is an annual. The dear old honeysuckle, hardy and beautiful, gives joy to generations. Hollyhocks, peonies, fox-glove, phlox, day-lilies and lilies of the valley, are all to be depended upon as tenants of the garden with an indefinite lease. She who wishes to have picturesque results must study harmony and contrast of color, and mass her flowers, grouping rather than scattering them. It is best to keep the flowers of one family together, and to give them associates that will be desirable neighbors so far as height, style, tone and perfume are concerned. Remember that some flowers love the sun, while others pine for the shade.

A wild garden or a rockery exacts little trouble after it is started. The boys of the family will take pleasure in helping mother and sisters with the big boulder and the smaller rocks that make the foundation for this corner in the garden. Plenty of earth carefully fertilized must be lodged in the crevices where seeds may be sown, seeds that will quickly germinate and cover the rocks with a mantle of verdure. Every expedition to the woods with basket and trowel should bring home specimens of the exquisite flowers that God plants in the forests; violets, hepaticas, jack-in-the-pulpit, ferns and such others as lend themselves to transplanting. A wild garden in the midst of a cultivated one is so sweet and has such bewitching simplicity that it awakens even more pleasure than one receives from the cultivated and orthodox habitues of the garden.

She who wants a pansy bed that will give her a wealth of velvet bloom and shy, quaint sweetness, may either purchase her plants in the spring and set them out, which is a costly proceeding, or she may plant her pansy seed on the first of June. She will have flowers before very long, and if she plant her pansies around her roses or as a border to her fox-glove and sweet-william, they will be all the prettier. A bed entirely devoted to pansies is never a mistake. The more pansies one picks the more one has. In the autumn cut them down to the ground and cover with manure and a light outer protection of straw. When this is removed in the spring after the winter snow, the pansies will be in bud.

The rose must always hold her proud pre-eminence as the garden's queen. Whatever other flowers may have bloomed in Eden, let no one doubt that the rose was there—creation's first masterpiece. An authority on rose-culture tells us that in the rose garden, be it small or large, we may look for exuberant bloom in June and early July. In Southern latitudes roses bloom in May. Most of us must be contented with rose-bloom in the early summer, with a scattering flower now and then until autumn.

"In late November the hardy ones get about a foot of stable litter over the beds. The everblooming kinds have six inches of manure, then a foot of leaves, and then a good covering of cedar branches over all. But cover late and uncover early (the very minute the frost is out of the ground), or your roses will die."

ISRAEL MIRACULOUSLY FED

International Sunday School Lesson for July 7

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE triumphal song at the Red Sea had hardly died away before Israel began the characteristic murmuring which so soon followed every miracle of deliverance. For three days they had journeyed without water—but not without God's promise and providence, they should have remembered. At last they saw a spring, and eagerly rushed forward to drink; but, alas! the waters were bitter. In tones no less bitter, they called it Marah—bitterness. "And the people murmured against Moses"—with as little reason as men in any age or land usually show in their murmurings. They were even sorry to be free, if freedom would cost a few days of thirst on the way to assured liberty and abundance. God and Moses might both have justly resented this childish murmuring, but in answer to a prayer of Moses, God pointed out a tree whose leaves were for the healing of the waters, and made it the occasion to promise Israel freedom from the diseases that he had put upon the Egyptians. He sealed the promise with the motto: "I am the Lord that healeth thee" (Ex. 15: 26).

"At even the quails came up"

Rest Among Springs

"And they came to Elim, where were twelve springs of water, and three score and ten palm trees: and they encamped there by the waters." After Marah's trial hour came Elim's abundant joys. But in a few days the characteristic murmuring of the Israelites broke out anew, as hunger this time tested their trust in God. They had brought with them only a small supply of food, save their flocks and herds, which could be killed for meat only to a very limited extent, and meat alone would not be a wholesome diet. God did not resent their murmuring, but said, in infinite mercy: "I will rain bread from heaven." And God spoke to Moses, telling him his plan for distributing the bread: "I will rain bread from heaven; and the people shall go out and gather a day's portion every day. . . . And it shall come to pass on the sixth day, that they shall prepare that which they shall bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily." And so when the people awoke in the early morning, the ground was white with snow-like manna—a word meaning: "What is it?" It was something new to them. Moses told them of the loving kindness of their heavenly Father. Then they began to gather the manna which had been given with generous hand, about six pints for each person. On the day before the Sabbath the supply was double, twelve pints each. God thus prompted them to "remember the Sabbath day," as he did again on the tables of stone given on Sinai. The lesson of Sabbath observance was further impressed upon them by the miraculous preservation of the manna to a second day only in case of the Sabbath, while if kept over one day at other times,it would become filled with worms. This Sabbath miracle was repeated through the forty years of their wilderness wanderings. This was not all that God gave them to eat. He sent quails in the evening, that they might have meat also.

Food Preferred to Liberty

Those dependants upon God's loving kindness, did they always receive their water and food with thanksgiving? No, they were so distrustful of their heavenly Father that their lips were often filled with murmuring. They even wished themselves back in Egypt with re-enslavement, if only they could have again their flesh-pots. Some of them, no doubt, murmured at the hardship of gathering it in the early morning and every morning. Some, perhaps, took exception to the quantity provided. Others, probably, complained that it was not suited to their taste. At last the Israelites generally declared that they "loathed" the bread from heaven. The patient, loving Father in heaven did not therefore leave them to themselves to starve, but continued the manna with the feast of birds at evening until after they had crossed the Jordan and Jericho had fallen. Then the manna ceased, and God gave them instead the Promised Land, "flowing with milk and honey."

Miracles of Deliverance

"The whole congregation of the children of Israel murmured." This is the fourth time in the forty-five days since the miraculous emancipation of the Israelites on Passover night, that they have broken into characteristic murmurings, which, like a doleful chorus after a glad song, followed God's miracles in their behalf all their journey through. They were scarcely out of hearing of the wailing Egyptians, smitten in their first-born that Israel might be free, before Israel murmured and longed to return to slavery, because they heard behind them the chariots of Pharaoh's pursuing hosts. (Ex. 14: 10-12.) These murmurings were silenced by another miracle of deliverance at the Red Sea, but only three days later they were murmuring again because of thirst, forgetting that the God who had used the waters of the Red Sea to destroy their foes could not fail to bring water in some way to save his people. After Marah's bitter spring had renewed their murmurings, God not only sweetened its waters, but brought them to Elim's springs and palms for a long rest. But they have scarcely gotten out of sight of Elim before they are murmuring again because of hunger, unwilling to bear a little present self-denial for the sake of future good. They longed to "eat bread to the full" in Egypt more than to be free—a history that has repeated itself in Italy, Spain and many other lands where "bread and games" have been preferred to liberty. Many a Moses has actually had to see those he had delivered march back to Egypt because they were not willing to pay the price of liberty.

Fruits of Suffering

Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler writes thus of Israel's experience at the spring of bitterness: "Right in the midst of joys and successes and of high hopes, we sometimes come suddenly upon a Marah of most distasteful disappointment. We had set our hearts upon some favorite plan or project. Perhaps, for example, we had made our arrangements for a pleasant tour; but the day for our departure found us on a bed of sickness, and the hardest dose to swallow was the disappointment. But presently we began to discover that the best place for us to be was at home, and even in that sick-room. It lay right on our road to Canaan, and our heavenward guide had led us there. We talked with our own hearts in that sick-room, we thought over our past lives, we tasted anew the comforts of prayer and the promises, we found out how much our friends loved us and how much God loved us. So as God opened the eyes of Moses to see a certain tree whose branches sweetened the fountain of Marah, he also opened our eyes to certain truths which sweetened the bitter cup which he had given us.

Relief Always Near

"By the time that the unwelcome sickness was over, we were ready to confess that it had been better for us to be shut up with Jesus awhile than to take the voyage to Europe or the journey to California. Observe that God did not create that tree whose branches sweetened the Marah fountain at the moment; he only "showed them the tree." In like manner God opens our eyes often to discover compensations and comforts and rich blessings which sweeten the bitterest trials. Faith, if it would always keep its eyes open, would see that all things, not only some things but all things, work together for good to them who love God."

"Moses said unto them, This is the bread which God hath given you"

Living in Thanksgiving Street

The London Christian World tells of a meeting in Yorkshire in which a good man had been drawing out long, complaining strains of experiences about his trials and difficulties in the way to heaven. Another of different spirit followed, who said: "I see our brother who has just sat down lives in Grumble Alley. I lived there myself for some time, and never enjoyed good health. The air was bad, the house bad, the water bad; the birds never came and sang in the street, and I was gloomy and sad enough. But I 'flitted.' I got into Thanksgiving Street, and ever since then I have had good health and so have my family. The air is pure, the water pure, the house good; the sun shines on it all day; the birds are always singing, and I am as happy as I can live. Now I recommend our brother to 'flit.' There are plenty of houses to let on Thanksgiving Street, and I am sure he will find himself a new man if he will only come, and I will be right glad to have him as a neighb six days a week, regardless of his n of support. Loafers, whether rich poor, are disobedient to that consti tional law against vagrancy. It is am ing that so many professedly Christian n and women regard idleness as the privil of every one who has at his command labor of others, or the capital that res from it. It is the very A, B, C of Bi teachings, coming to us from the very G den of Eden, that service is honorable a the duty of all.

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?

Work is not a curse, but overwork work conducted in the wrong spirit master or servant, or work at the wro time or place. I see no escape without d loyalty to God and man and our own selv from the law that every whole man woman should work regularly six days week at some regular manual or men task. It is a false view to think of wo as primarily a means of livelihood. In t case of the preacher, the statesman, t artist, public service is considered t primary motive of the work done, a salary is but secondary. It should be none the less in the case of the mecha and the merchant.

Labor a Joy

The supreme mistake of many lab leaders is that they deride this divine la as they did when President Eliot of H vard University said "that workmen shou find joy in their labor," the joy of maste over nature, the joy of usefulness. One the daughters of wealth who has for yea devoted herself to bettering the conditi of working girls, and works to that end regularly as they work at their tasks, wont to say, "I have been paid in a vance." How strange that almost ever body thinks of the Fourth Commandme as requiring only a weekly suspension of labor, as if it were a law of the one da when it is on its face a law for the who seven days of each week, requiring work six as plainly as it requires rest on t other. A man having dismissed an e ployee for breaking the Fourth Comman ment, the latter exclaimed indignantly "Why, I always rest on the Sabbath. "Yes," said the master, "and on all t other days too." The man who has master but God is no less at fault if rests, when in health, beyond the rest da the rest month and the rest year of God plan.

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

KAISER WILLIAM, of Germany, has in many ways been cultivating the friendship of the United States. Recently the salary of the German ambassador to this country was increased by several thousands, in order that he might take one of the highest social positions in Washington. It is said that the Kaiser has a strong liking for President Roosevelt himself. Now it is announced that the Emperor is to send his son, Prince August Wilhelm of Prussia, to take a course in Harvard, the university at which President Roosevelt was educated. The Prince will register this coming fall. Several years ago the brother of the Kaiser, Prince Henry of Prussia, visited Harvard. Since then a Germanic museum has been established there, and two of the professors have been made knights of the German order of the Red Eagle.

MR. JOHN M. GLENN, of Baltimore, has been chosen as the active manager of the Sage Foundation, which was created some time ago by Mrs. Russell Sage, to serve the cause of philanthropy. Mr. Glenn is a graduate of Washington and Lee University, and has had many years of valuable experience in charitable and social organizations. He was president of the National Conference of Charities and Correction and lecturer at the Johns Hopkins University. "In all of these positions," says an admirer, "he has shown independent devotion to the public good, and an intellectual sanity, free from coldness on the one side and extravagance on the other." Mr. Glenn will have a fund of $400,000 to carry out the purposes of Mrs. Sage.

AN UNUSUAL HONOR for a woman, and one carrying with it great responsibility, has just come to Miss Gertrude Beeks, who has been appointed commissioner to investigate the food, housing and amusements of the thousands of laborers who are now digging the big ditch at Panama. The commission comes from Secretary Taft, but the appointment had the full approval of the President. Miss Beeks is secretary of the Welfare Department of the Civic Federation. She has traveled a great deal in the interest of the work, and last year investigated the condition of the children employed in the Southern cotton mills. Welfare work for government employees is the latest departure of the Civic Federation. Mr. Taft is secretary of the committee. Every opportunity will be given the commissioner by the engineers in charge in Panama to carry on her investigations.

The Pope and the Bible

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the issue for May 29, has an interesting article with the above title, narrating "a remarkable new departure of the Pontiff, who now advises the general reading of the Gospels and Acts." The translation of a letter written by the Pope to the President of the Society of St. Jerome is given, and apparently marks the "new departure." Pope Pius felicitates the Society that "by special permission of the Supreme See" it has issued "about five hundred thousand copies of the Gospels," and praises this zealous work because "nothing can be conceived more eminently effective to inform us as to holiness than the life of Christ." The letter goes on to say that the writer commends the daily reading of the Society's book, which contains the four Gospels and the Acts only, and thus "rebukes the prejudice that the Latin Church does not wish to permit, or opposes, the reading of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue."

This does certainly have the sound of a "new departure;" but it is to be noted that after the complimentary part of the letter, the writer proceeds to announce that the Society, instead of doing anything else, should hold as a sufficient field of labor its efforts to publish the Gospel and the Acts. In short, he commands the Society to stop where it is, and forbids it to publish the rest of the New Testament, a work which its leaders have been contemplating doing as soon as possible. In other words, the faithful must be content with a New Testament of five books, and the remaining twenty-two are not needed. But this does not mean that the Society's edition gluts the market. Latterly, some mysterious cause has made it almost impossible to find this edition in the bookshops of Italy. It is said that the copies have been withdrawn and stored in one of the churches in Rome. As this practically puts the edition "out of print," and as the Pope interdicts the publication of a complete New Testament, the "new departure" seems akin to the sturdy rowing of the oarsman whose boat was tied to the wharf, and serves to accentuate the duty of every Bible lover toward ignorant members of the Latin Church, and particularly toward the Italians.

Premiums Stop at Age 75

Industrial Policyholders of The Prudential who have attained age 75, and who attain that age during 1907, will then have to pay no further premiums.

Should this concession be continued, it is estimated that it would cost the Company over $3,250,000 in ten years.

The Prudential has already returned more than $8,000,000 to its Industrial Policyholders which their contracts did not call for.

CLEVER DOCTOR

Relieved a 20-Years' Trouble Without Any Medicine.

A wise Ind. physician relieved a 20-years' stomach disease without any medicine, as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried doctors' medicines, patent medicines and all simple remedies suggested by my friends, but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor, who is the most prominent physician in this part of the State, told me medicine would do me no good—only irritate my stomach and make it worse—that I must look to diet and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm: 'Quit drinking coffee! Why, what will I drink?'

"'Try Postum,' said the doctor. 'I drink it, and you will like it when it is made according to directions and served with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well, that was over two years ago and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again, and I know Doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place."

Never too late to mend. Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. "There's a Reason."

THE PREACHER'S GRIP

By W. H. WITHROW

"SAY, Phin, let's put up a joke on the preacher," said Jim Larkins, a loutish fellow, to his ne'er-do-weel comrade in many a drinking bout at the village tavern.

"I'm in it, whatever it is," replied Phin Crowle, with a vicious grin.

These worthies were notable sports and dog-fanciers, and each had his fighting bulldog "that could whip anything of its size or weight in the country." It was agreed, therefore, to bring their respective dogs to the evening preaching, to keep them asunder till the service was well under way, and then to incite them to a fight. A few well-directed digs with their heels excited the beasts to angry growls and snarls, to the great amusement of the village toughs and to the great alarm of the women and girls.

Lawrence Temple, a student from a neighboring college, had just been appointed a local preacher with a view to the ministry. He was sent to try his 'prentice hand on the natives of the Four Corners Schoolhouse, a neglected rural neighborhood near the college town. His first preaching experiences were likely to be, to put it mildly, not uninteresting.

His previous practice of athletics in felling trees in a lumber camp stood him in good stead. He did not easily get rattled nor lose his head. When the disturbance became too obvious, he requested the owners of the dogs to keep them quiet or to take them out. When the annoyance continued, he announced that the disturbing of a religious service was a violation of the law and must cease at once.

"Now's yer time, Phin," said Larkins, in a loud aside, "let her go," and in a minute the exasperated dogs were rushing at each other's throats and causing a panic of terror among the women.

Quickly leaving the teacher's desk which served as a preaching stand, Lawrence walked down the central passage to where the dogs were snapping, snarling and rolling over each other on the floor.

"Take your dogs out," he said with a very decided tone and gesture. Seeing that their owners took no notice, he added sternly: "And do it at once."

"Take 'em out yerself if yer wants to," said Phin Crowle, "but I warns yer it's at yer peril. If my Tige grips yer leg he'll never let go—not if yer cuts his head off."

"Open the door, please," said the young preacher, which was promptly done by a man sitting near it.

Lawrence had not practised football in vain. Before their loutish owners could interfere, he had planted a well-directed and tremendous kick on the interlocked and astonished dogs that unlocked their jaws; followed by two others, that swept first one and then the other over the threshold and into the outer darkness before they knew where they were.

"Now follow your dogs!" he said grimly to the cowardly bullies—for your bully is always a coward.

"Supposin' we don't choose to!" drawled Larkins.

"I'll simply have to make you!" said Lawrence with blazing eyes, "and to-morrow have you fined for disturbing public worship."

"Let's go, Jim," said Phin; "he's got the drop on us this time."

"We'll be even with yer yet, Mr. Preacher, and be blanked to yer," growled the human brute, Larkins, more degraded than his dog, and went into the blackness of night making the air lurid with oaths and curses.

In a moment Lawrence was calm again, and with earnest pleading tones he read over the words in the Apocalypse concerning the finally impenitent: "'Without,' in the blackness of darkness forever, 'are dogs, and sorcerers, and whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie,'" and with tears in his voice he exhorted his hearers to heed the solemn warnings of God and to flee from his present and eternal wrath. His words came home with strange power and not a few of the ruffians' companions who had "come to scoff remained to pray."

An hour later Lawrence was making his way home from his first service at the Four Corners Schoolhouse. A great gladness filled his soul and he heeded not the wild and wintry winds nor the drifting clouds that were scudding rapidly across the sky. Through their rifts the moon shone brightly. Just as he reached a bridge across a deep ravine two figures glided out of the shadows of the trees, accompanied by two dogs. Lawrence at once recognized them as Jim Larkins and Phin Crowle and their invariable companions—we might almost say comrades—Bull and Tige.

"Now, Mr. Preacher," growled Larkins, "I said I'd be even with yer yet, and blest if it isn't goin' to be ter-night." Only 'blest" was not exactly the word he used, but one of opposite meaning.

"I have no cause of quarrel with you," said Lawrence. "I forgive you all about that little incident at the schoolhouse."

"But I ain't forguv yer, nor Bull neither, and we've got yer where we want yer. Sic 'm, Bull! Sic 'm, Tige!"

Ominous growlings and snarlings followed, but just then a rift in the cloud emitted a bright gleam of moonlight which, reflected by the snow, revealed the group with almost the light of day. Both dogs seemed to recognize the man with the emphatic boots with which they had so recently made unpleasant acquaintance, and slunk behind their respective owners.

"Curse 'em! I never knowed 'em to do like that afore. Ye're not afraid, be yer? 'Ere, Bull, sic 'im. Tige, seize holt."

But though they growled and showed their teeth, they backed away.

"We'll have to wade in, Phin."

"I have no quarrel with either of you, and don't want to have," said Lawrence.

"Oh, ye're a coward, be yer? On yer own ground in the schoolhouse yer wuz bold enough, but here yer sings another tune. Ye've got ter fight, and one or other of us goes over that bridge," and he pointed to the deep shadows in the ravine.

"Not I, if I can help it, nor you either, so far as I am concerned," replied Lawrence, calmly.

"Take that, will yer?" said Larkins, and he hit him a buffet on the cheek.

"I never struck a man yet," said Lawrence, "and I don't intend to; but I don't object to a passive resistance," and he skilfully warded off blow after blow of Larkins' furious onset.

"Why don't ye pitch in, Phin? Give it 'im heavy."

"Not I," said Phin. "It's no fun hittin' a man that won't hit back. I'll stand by and see fair play."

"Curse 'im an' yer too. It's not fair play I want, but his blood, an' I'll have it, fair play or foul," and he made a mad rush at Lawrence which would have swept him over the undefended edge of the bridge, had he not been quick as a weasel.

Larkins, with another rush, got inside Lawrence's guard and flung his long arms around the slim student preacher with a grasp like a boa-constrictor's. The ground was icy. Lawrence was in real peril of being hurled over the bridge side into the ravine whose bottom was studded with stumps and wood-cutters' debris. Put to his mettle he got a wrestling grip on Lar-

Let me make a splint," and he rapidly shaped two flat pieces of wood, and saying, "See, Phin, how it is done," carefully bound them with his own handkerchief on the sprained wrist. "Isn't that better?" he asked.

"Ain't so all-fired painful as 'twuz," admitted Larkins.

"Now let me make you a sling. Got another handkerchief, boys?" But neither of them possessed such an article; so Phin took off his braces—"galluses," he called them—and "took up the slack of his trousers," as he termed it, with a nail, while Lawrence made a sling to support the injured wrist.

"I am very, very sorry," he said; "I didn't want to hurt you, believe me."

"Oh, hang it all," said Larkins, "served me right, I guess—ye're not such a bad lot arter all. Will yer shake hands and call it quits?" and he held out his uninjured hand. "I meant murder, though, blest I didn't!"—and this time the word was not a curse. "I couldn't have done like yer did arter the ways I treated yer, not by a jugful. Will yer forgive me?"

"With all my heart," said Lawrence; and as he shook hands with both the cronies, he added, "I bear you no malice at all. God bless you both."

"Here, Bull, here, Tige," said the discomfited comrades as they lurched along to the Four Corners, and Lawrence went light-hearted on his way to town. He had both killed an enemy and made a friend, adopting the Master's own method, the true psychology of overcoming evil with good. Henceforth Larkins and Crowle were the preacher's champions at the Four Corners.

"He ain't no slouch at a wrastle nuther," Larkins admitted to Phin; "that underholt uv his is a corker."

AT THE HAGUE

AT The Hague the clans are gathering—
Many a world-wide guest.
What has caused this great uprising
And this eager quest?
Come they forth at war's rude clamor?
Meet they now for strife?
Seek they to avenge their honor
At the cost of life?

Nay! they come for bloodless conquest,
That all strife may cease:
Hailing man as man and brother—
Blessed, blessed peace!
No more let the vulture hover
O'er the battle plain:
No more let the wife and mother
Weep above the slain.

In this council of the nations,
Justice, bear thy sway:
Let protection for the weakest
Have the right of way.
God of nations, give them wisdom
And the needed light:
Let them find a true solution
In the law of right.

Christians, pray ye for your rulers,
For the right and law;
Send the Gospel on its mission,
Till it banish war.
Speed, oh, speed the glad evangel,
Till all strife shall cease!
Till this world shall hail the coming
Of the Prince of Peace.

Good News For Policy Holders

The election for Trustees in the Mutual Life Insurance Company closed in December last. The canvass of votes, which was conducted according to the new laws of the State of New York, lasted four months. The result has recently been announced. The most important fact for the public is that by an overwhelming majority—about three to one—the Trustees named by the Company have been elected. This means that will be managed by the men who corrected the abuses of the past and installed the economies that have accomplished so much, and which will accomplish so much more. It is most reasonable to expect greater benefits as time goes on. Get the latest report of the Company. Get the recent address of the Trustees to policy holders; it is most interesting. Get acquainted with the Mutual Life; it is better to-day than ever. Get its protection while possible.

South Dakota's Great Revival

A SERIES of union meetings of the Protestant churches was held lately under the leadership of Evangelist Robert E. Johnson and his singer, Mr. G. W. Forman, at Aberdeen, S. D., March 10 to April 14, during which there were over 900 professions of faith in Christ. The town has about 8,000 population and is the leading business town in the State.

During the progress of the meetings, the people of Groton, S. D., where Mr. Johnson had held a series of meetings the previous month with 375 professions, came twice to Aberdeen on special trains, bringing many who had been converted in their meetings at Groton.

The Thursday of the last week of the meetings an "all day for God" was held, during the afternoon of which the leading stores and all the banking houses closed from 2.30 until 4 o'clock, most of their people attending the afternoon services.

Among things of especial interest during the meetings was the reconciling of a husband and wife who were about to be divorced. During the aftermeeting, with their little child, they came to the front and acknowledged Christ as their Saviour and were reunited. A man driving a brewery wagon was converted, gave up his position, secured another, and has united with the church. One young man living at Aberdeen wanted to go to his home at Ipswich, S. D., on election day to vote against license. He missed his train and walked twenty-six miles to his home, arriving there fifteen minutes before the polls closed, and the election went "dry" by one vote.

On the night of a sermon on "Popular Amusements," many of the leading card-players and dancers of the town attended together with others and pledged themselves to take a strong stand against these things. They came forward hy hundreds and publicly renounced their sinful pleasures. Some prominent society women were among the number.

On the last Sunday night there were 142 professions. The people invited the evangelists to remain over for a Monday night service and there were 60 more professions, among them some of the most prominent business people. The people wished the workers to stay even longer, but the manager of the auditorium refused, saying Mr. Johnson could not speak in his auditorium any longer, because he had spoken against his theatrical business, and one company nearly went to the wall during the revival meetings. When this was announced to the audience, a tabernacle was proposed, and hundreds of people sprang to their feet pledging the necessary money. Between 50 and 100 men volunteered their services to help build it. One carpenter gave his services and those of ten workers under him. The next afternoon the volunteers began work and soon erected a tabernacle 90x128 feet to accommodate about 2,500 people, in sixteen hours actual working time. The tabernacle contained 60,000 feet of lumber, and was erected solely to accommodate five days of additional meetings and one temperance meeting. They built faster than six wagons could haul the lumber. Among those who gave material and encouragement was ex-Governor Herried of South Dakota. The evangelists also closed a very interesting series of union meetings at Alexandria, S. D., on May 12, with over 300 professions, among whom were some of the most prominent business and professional men of the place, including the proprietor of the opera house, his oldest son (the opera house manager) and another son. A remarkable instance of prevailing prayer was related. The wife and mother in their home told them she meant to eat but one meal a day and pray until God saved them. She did and they were saved.

The two publishers of the Alexandria Herald and their families were among the converts. One convert was a man of about sixty-five, who was believed to be an out-and-out infidel. On the closing night of the meetings, he was on the platform leading in prayer with the converts. Another grand sight was that of the ex-sheriff, a big man about six feet four inches, who came down the line to accept Christ and brought with him a man whom he had taken to the penitentiary when he was sheriff. He was now leading him to Christ as he came to surrender his own life to him.

CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM*

VERY pathetic were the appeals of the ancient prophets to the people of their day to save their country from the slough into which it periodically fell. They knew that idolatry and vice must inevitably provoke the anger of God and would end in the destruction of the nation. Its independence could not be maintained by its own strength. Egypt on the west, or Assyria on the east could easily overwhelm the feeble nation. Its only hope of survival was the protection of Jehovah. If ever a nation had cause to cleave to its God and obey his laws and strive to please him, it was the Hebrew nation.

The old history is very quaint and its conditions under the kings "who did not do right in the eyes of the Lord," and of the kings "who caused Israel to sin," sound very strange in the ears of modern citizens of this great republic, but God has not changed, and he still rules over the nations. We may be quite sure that he has not abdicated his rule, and that he has not changed his principles. We have no king to cause us to sin, no enemy to come up and lay siege to our cities, but we make a great mistake if we suppose that national wrongdoing will escape the judgment of God, or that it is safe to ignore him. It would, we imagine, be possible to write a history of the Hebrew people, in which their misfortunes could be traced to material causes, and in which no reference was made to their relation to God. It might be shown that Assyria had its own reasons for invading Palestine. Isaiah and Jeremiah said God sent the enemy; a modern historian might say that Nebuchadnezzar was obliged, by the necessities of his ambition, to crush the little nation. The only thing clearly visible to us at this lapse of time is, that when the kingdom was unfaithful to its God, it was punished.

The punishments were too regular and too marked to be called coincidences. The Hebrew kings and statesmen could not look back over the history of the people without being impressed by the fact that national sin, long continued, was followed by national calamity. That is the lesson we have to learn, for their God is our God, and his nature has not changed. He is able now, as then, to chastise us as a nation for our national sins, and he has still his methods of inflicting punishment. We may fancy that we can live as we choose; that we can go on making money and spending it in luxury, heedless of the want and suffering around us; that we can permit corruption in municipal government and ungodliness in social life; but for all these things we must give account. There are sufficient good Christian people in this country to effect reforms, but they are indifferent and allow bad men to rule, until we are a laughing-stock to the civilized nations. Until the Christian has done all in his power by his vote, by his influence and by his example, to improve the moral tone of the community, he has not cleared himself of responsibility.

PORK AND BEANS

The Mouth-Watering Memory in the Childish Mind

When the children get hungry and try to think of something extra good which they would like to have, then comes the pungent recollection of the last time mother had Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce for dinner.

It's a memory that makes their little mouths fairly water.

For what is so good to the childish taste as a steaming hot dish of Van Camp's, with its savory odor and all its appetizing deliciousness?

And what is so nourishing to the childish body as the nutritious, healthful, vitalizing Van Camp beans cooked in the Van Camp way?

You know that beans are one of the most healthful of all foods—and Van Camp's beans are the most nutritious of all beans.

Van Camp's beans are 84 per cent nutrition.

Van Camp's beans are filled to the bursting point with nitrogenous elements—the muscle-building—brain-developing elements that make healthy bodies and bright minds.

Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce are just the food for growing children.

And you never have to coax children to eat Van Camp's, but you always have your hands full satisfying the clamor of their healthy young appetites for more and still more Van Camp's.

How they revel in the appetizing goodness of the nutty-flavored Van Camp beans—in the piquant tang of the delicious Van Camp Tomato Sauce, made from vine-ripened Tomatoes fresh from the garden! And then there's the succulent slice of tender pork crowning the whole with its juicy richness—just enough richness for flavor and health.

Don't ever disappoint the children by having to tell them you are "out of Van Camp's."

Always keep a supply on hand—a dozen cans, at least.

And be sure you order and get Van Camp's.

Sunday Schools Meet in Rome

own the east coast between Barce- nd Gibraltar), began ten years ago. ot under the auspices of or aided by ociety. At the present time there are day school about 350 pupils. But ost successful part of our work is unday School.

his is how we do our work in Spain: are many watchmakers in the world, Spain there are many with us with- ocks, and although the time for the y School is ten o'clock on Sunday ng, not a few children appear as as eight. We open the doors and a certain care of them. Four of the rs begin to play the tambourines e inner court connected with the l building. About half an hour before ime for beginning Sunday School, irector goes out with scholars and tambourines, and they march through rincipal streets, and by the time they back to the school they have about usand children. [Applause.] In Spain is not religious liberty, but we take . [Applause.]

The buildings are comparatively small, we have two halls, and into these we about 600 in each. I speak to the r children in one of the halls, suffi- ly long to explain to them the Sunday ol lesson. I then speak to the little ren, and after they have listened and hymns and prayer has been offered, doors are shut and then the magic rn is brought out. When they have there with the door shut and the ows shut, and six hundred children ked in that little building, they do not r from the cold."

he report for Great Britain was deliv- by a former president of a World's vention whose name is a household throughout that country, Mr. F. F. ey, J. P., of London. Mr. Belsey ared that the Sunday School enrol- t of Great Britain numbered about 0,000 teachers and scholars in the Free rch Schools.

The report for the United States was n by Mr. William N. Hartshorn, of ton, the chairman of the International cutive Committee. He stated that the l enrolment there reached about 00,000, or about seventeen per cent. of estimated population of 85,000,000.

On the morning of the last day of the vention, a number of far-reaching res- tions were adopted. One of them was institution of "World's Sunday School y," to be observed annually on the third day of October. The day is to be erved especially by private and public yer in behalf of Sunday Schools through- the world.

The Convention also expressed its pro- nd regret at the fact that the kingdom Greece is the only country in the world, ilized or uncivilized, in which the circu- tion of the Word of God is officially hibited "in the language of the people, language of the schools, the press and platform."

A most picturesque meeting of the Con- tion was held on the afternoon of the t day. At four o'clock the delegates nt to the historic Coliseum, inside the ns of which a Gospel service was held. was probably one of the most enthusias- meetings ever held in that famous ucture, which was erected A.D. 72. The vice consisted of the reading of Scrip- re selections about Paul's imprisonment d martyrdom in Rome; the singing of All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name" d "Praise God, from Whom all Blessings ow"; the reading by Rev. F. B. Meyer a poem written expressly for the oc- sion; prayer by Dr. M. Rhodes, of St. uis, and the benediction by Bishop J. C. artzell. In this manner the delegates, representing a score or more of different lands, celebrated the triumph of the Chris tian religion, which the Roman Emperors thought they were utterly destroying in that spot, when they threw hundreds of the early Christians to the wild beasts.

Directly following the close of the Convention, the Executive Committee of the new World's Sunday School Association held an important meeting in Rome, at which they decided upon a notable tour of the world by Sunday School workers in two years. It is to be called a "World's Sunday School Visitation," and is to be composed of practical Sunday School workers, who will pay their own expenses and will give their time and efforts for the extension of the kingdom of Christ through the Sunday School in conference and co-operation with Sunday School workers; especially in Japan, India and China. A ship will be chartered and will probably sail from New York in December, 1908.

It has not yet been decided where the next World's Convention will be held. It will probably, however, be convened in the year 1910. GEORGE T. B. DAVIS.

Christian Citizenship*

TIMES have changed since Paul wrote those words warning Christians against resisting the powers that be. In his day resistance would have been worse than useless. The young church was an infinitesimal part of Rome's great empire, and would have been inevitably wiped out if it had taken the lead against the imperial tyranny. Acting on his advice it meekly submitted to oppression, to prison and to death; and even the tyrant could not charge it with sedition or rebellion. But there were limits to the power. The Christian could not be coerced into doing things that his conscience forbade. He was willing to suffer like the three heroes in Babylon, but he would not bow down to the golden image. Nor was Paul himself always the meek sufferer he described. When the authorities at Philippi beat him and put him in prison, he compelled them to apologize for their illegal act; nor was his retort to the high priest (Acts 23:3) far removed from contempt of court. No man abnegates his legal rights or forswears manliness in becoming a Christian.

In our own day, we can imagine that the apostle would have been a leader in enforcing righteous government. He would have told the citizens who absent themselves from the polls and take no interest in politics, that they were neglecting their duty and that they were not free from responsibility in submitting to the rule of wicked men. It is easier and quieter to avoid the strife of politics, but it is ignoble. Had our fathers been thoughtful of their own comfort, we would never have had the privileges we possess. They struggled and fought and suffered that we might be free, yet there are some communities in which their struggle has gone for nothing, because of the indifference of their descendants. The time has come when men should realize that their privileges constitute a trust to which they cannot be unfaithful without responsibility. God looks to his people to do all in their power to make this a righteous nation, and he has increased their power that they may use it. The patriot has often cause for shame as he reads of the decisions of the aldermen of his city, and of the open corruption of the legislature of his State; yet at the next primary he stays at home and allows corrupt men to nominate the candidates, and leaves the convention to be run by saloonkeepers and professional politicians. The man who fails to use his privilege is perilously near to losing it, as he deserves to do.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Romance of Early Christianity in Norway*

POINTING to the shore, now distinct and near at hand, Harald said:

"Christ has been kind. Behold the land of which the Skald told at Olaf's feast!"

Persea gazed at the shore with wonderment. Then God's spirit spoke to her spirit. Her bosom rose and fell with deep breaths; her eyes dilated as though they saw marvelous visions; her body inclined forward as though she listened to some voice from the New World. Still seeing the unseen, still listening to the unheard, she raised her hand, and pointing towards the sleeping continent, said:

"Men of Norge, Christ has given us this joy, this first knowledge of land that is all unknown to the inhabitants of the world behind us. It is fair to see. It is virgin, pure, unstained by the sins and wickedness of that world we have just left.

"Behind us, the nations of the earth groan under a bondage of sin and woe. There is no place for the human soul to worship God in spirit and in truth. But Christ's truth cannot die. The time will come when it shall make men so strong that they will burst all bonds of tyranny, and come forth to build a new nation beyond the Western Sea, which shall recognize truth. Christ has vouchsafed to us the first landing upon the shore he has sanctified. Let us take possession of it in Christ's name, and for his use. Let the land be called Christ's land; for Christ shall rule over it as long as the sun shall endure.

"Upon this shore, countless blessings shall descend of which humanity, as yet, knows nothing. Even as we have fled from the wrath and destruction that menaced us in the world of men, so shall the coming centuries find the burdened, the seeker of truth, the sorrowing, the persecuted, flying from the error and finding here the peace of Christ. It is Christ's land. Let us keep it sacred to his name in every word and deed."

The king, still smiling graciously, replied:

"Olaf's greeting to thee and yonder beautiful bride. If thou speakest truly—if the king's presence makes whiter the mead-foam and greater the joy in your hearts—can it not add also to the glory of the wedding-feast by providing such entertainment as never guests knew before?"

Harald's eyes searched the king's smiling countenance. Behind that gracious manner he saw something lurking—something cruel and cunning. . . .

The king had not forgotten and forgiven as he had believed. From the moment of Olaf's landing, Harald had looked for the answer to his challenge of many months ago; but it had not come. The king had been kindly in his greeting, reverent towards Persea—had said naught of the past. But now! Deep and dark had been the evil purposes in his heart. With his hatred of old, he had waited to strike until the striking would bring the greatest pain. Well, what matter? Was not a just God still ruling in heaven?

Faith touched that which had gripped his heart. His breath came back. He felt again the warm blood flowing in manly pulse through his veins. He spoke:

"Gladly will I welcome aught that would give pleasure to the king or my guests. Never Thrandheim wedding had more of joy in its feasting than this one here to-night. If thou wilt make it equally rich in entertainment, thou wilt have the thanks of Harald Rognvaldson. Let the king speak."

Still the smile on Olaf's countenance. Still the tiger in him crouched and crept.

"Hast thou forgotten, Harald Rognvaldson, to whom thy bride really belongs? Hast thou forgotten that thou didst challenge me to a settlement of my claim and thine by trial of sword or ordeal? If thou hast forgotten, Olaf has a clearer memory. What better time than now to decide the matter? What better sport for thy guests? What greater honor for so lovely a bride than that warriors should match skill with skill for the pleasure of being with her?"

The foregoing extracts from the thrilling novel of the days when the Norsemen sailed to America, are sufficient to commend it to the general reader.

Twentieth century civilization finds difficulty in comprehending the firmly-rooted heathenism through which Christianity slowly, but surely, made its way, almost a thousand years after the birth of Christ.

So far as we know, the author of The Star of Valhalla has chosen a hitherto unplowed field of literature in her selection of the reign of King Olaf as the central theme of her romance. Around his introduction of a crude and distorted Christianity into the "Land of the Midnight Sun," in the tenth century, is woven a tale drawn from the weird sagas of the Northland.

Though dealing with and correctly portraying important historical characters and events, the roselight of the low-swinging sun and the shifting splendor of the northern skies form a harmonious background for the development of more than one intensely strong love story of man and maid. Miss Gross has produced a vividly fascinating book, powerful to a degree and showing a grasp of unusual conditions exceedingly rare in the modern novel.

The Star of Valhalla. By Myra Geraldine Gross. Illustrated in colors by Archie Gunn. Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York, publishers. Pp. 350. Price $1.50.

The Bible in Modern English*

PARTS and single volumes of this interesting work have been widely read here and in all the English-speaking countries. Of the Pauline Epistles alone, 11,000 have been called for. The entire Bible has now been finished and a uniform edition is on sale. The general plan of the work is familiar to our readers through our former notices. Its peculiarity is that it is not the turning of the Authorized or Revised Version into colloquial English, but a new and direct translation from the original Hebrew, Chaldee and Greek. Mr. Fenton says he made the acquisition of those languages the chief purpose of his life for fifty years, devoting to the study every hour he could use, until he became so familiar with them that their meaning was apparent to the eye at sight, and he did not have to translate mentally, as the scholar does a work in a foreign language. He saw new beauties in the sacred books when read under these advantages, and desired to present them to the world. They would, he believed, be more useful and popular if given to the public in the language of the street and the market instead of in the dignified and antiquated diction of the King James or Authorized or Revised Version. The result is the five volumes before us. The first volume consists of the Pentateuch; the second contains Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings; the third contains the prophets, excepting Daniel; the fourth is a book of the poetry idyls and later histories, including Daniel, the Psalms, Esther, Chronicles, etc.; the fifth volume is given up to the New Testament, beginning with the Gospel of John and his first Epistle, then the synoptic Gospels, the Acts and the Pauline Epistles, Hebrews, and the remaining books in their familiar order. The arrangement is novel and Mr. Fenton gives his reasons for adopting it in the prefaces to the various volumes. The familiar style of the translation is somewhat of a shock to the Bible reader who venerates the ordinary versions, but if it serves the purpose of making the meaning of the inspired writers clear, it should be welcomed and studied.

*Newly translated from the original languages by Ferrar Fenton, M.C.A.A. Five volumes, $1.10 each. For sale by Wm. M. Langdon, 149 Broadway, New York.

The Hand of Blessing

STRETCH out your hand in blessing,
Jesus the Saviour said;
Ye who, my name confessing,
Ask for your daily bread;
Give to the hungry from your store;
Give, as I give you, o'er and o'er.

Stretch out the hand of blessing,
Ye who have known no need;
Thus in my name confessing
To love's unchanging creed:
Give from the largeness of your store;
Give, as I give you, more and more.

Astronomical Queries

"IS there a planet Vulcan?" A. asks. I answer, it is possible, but very improbable. If there is, it is between Mercury and the sun, and doubtless very small and too near the sun to be ever discovered—certainly not except during a total eclipse.

B. asks: "Why is the earth nearer the sun in winter than in summer?" It is in perihelion (nearest the sun) about January 5 and in aphelion about July 3, caused by its orbit around the sun being an ellipse instead of a circle. If it were a circle with the sun in the centre, its distance would be every day alike—93,000,000 miles.

C. asks: "How many stars are in the Southern Cross?" It depends on what magnitude you mean, whether naked eye, telescopic or photographic. Only about a dozen are visible to the naked eye, several hundred telescopic and many thousand photographic.

D. asks if the planets produce any influence on the earth, causing storms or electrical effects, and if the moon has such an influence. The planets attract the earth, but their combined effect is imperceptible. The moon's attraction is visible in raising tides on both sides of the earth at once.

To the question: "Does the moon have anything to do with changing the weather?" I answer, No.

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 17, the question "What is the length of time between two full moons?" was asked, and incorrectly answered. The moon has two periodic times: siderial and synodic. Her motion from a star to the same star again occupies 27½ days, but produces no effect on the moon's phases. When the moon, earth and sun are in line, the earth in the middle, the moon is full; and when so placed again, 29½ days have elapsed. When, however, again in line, with moon in middle, she is called "new moon." This change also occupies 29½ days.

E. asks: "Why does not the sun rise and set at six o'clock on March 20 as it did 75 years ago?" The sun never rose at six and set at six on the same day and never will. There is generally a difference of fourteen minutes, the time it takes the sun to move from sunrise to sunset. There are several things to be considered: One is refraction of the atmosphere at the eastern horizon, causing it to rise too soon, and at the western horizon, causing it to set too late, thus shortening the forenoons and lengthening the afternoons, which cannot be considered here in detail.

A child was born February 29, 1896, but had no birthday until 1904—eight years. Why did it not have one in 1900, divisible as it was by four?

If our year were composed of 365 days, no hours, no minutes, no seconds, no leap year would be required. If it were composed of exactly 365 days and 6 hours, then a leap day added every fourth year, no error of dates would result. This is the Julian Calendar, calling the year too long by 11 minutes, 14 seconds, while its exact length is 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, 49 seconds. When the error had amounted to 10 days, in 1582, Pope Gregory corrected the calendar according to the true length of a year. Dates previous were called old style, and after, new style. The Gregorian Calendar was not adopted in England till 1752. The error of the Gregorian Calendar amounts to exactly 1 day in 3,846 years. The difference between the two calendars amounts to three days in 400 years, therefore 3 leap days must be dropped during every 400 years, the rule for their dropping being that all centennial years to be leap years must be divisible by 400 as well as by 4. Thus 1600 was leap year, while 1700, 1800 and 1900 were common years, though divisible by 4. The year 2000 will be a leap year, but 2100, 2200 and 2300 will not; but 2400 will be, and so on forever, shortening every 400 years by three days. The reader will now see why the child got no birthday in 1900.

ACROSS PORTO RICO

"CABALLO! Arria!" shouted my Porto Rican driver, while he applied the lash and clanged the gong as we clattered from the San Francisco Plaza, in San Juan Bautista, scattering the crowd of natives in the street.

As I was whirled along I could not help dwelling on the beautiful view of San Juan. When viewed from the lofty lighthouse which rises above the moss-grown parapets of Morro Castle, San Juan appears resting upon the opposite shoulder of the promontory. Massive public buildings of stone and stucco, stained in time-mellowed tones of red, yellow and blue, crown the summit, and sinking away in broad, low terraces are rows of residences, each with its court embellished with palms and tropical flowers. There are several plazas surrounded with shrubbery and adorned with statuary, the most notable figure being that of Columbus, wrought in white Carrara marble and surmounting a lofty Tuscan column. The deep blue water of the Atlantic shoals to green upon the coral reefs, and breaks into spray upon the rocks at the foot of the Morro. The shore of the harbor at the south is fringed with palms, and beyond rises a majestic range of mountains. The city presents a picture which seems to justify its fame of being one of the most beautiful examples of the walled town.

The driver of my carriage, who was responsible for much of the racket which attended our departure from San Juan, was not lazy in the use of the whip, for he kept the little horses on a gallop uphill and down. The animals were undersized and did not look strong; my sympathies were aroused, and I tried to make the man understand that I did not want to ride so fast. He regarded me in a friendly way, as I tried to convey my meaning in pantomime. Evidently interpreting my gestures to mean that we were going too slow, and ever willing to accommodate the Americano, he applied the whip more furiously than before.

In order to reach Coamo Springs, where I was to spend the night, it was necessary to travel sixty miles the first day. Fortunately for my harrowed sympathies, we were given five relays of fresh horses for the journey. I seized every such opportunity to walk on until overtaken.

It was market day, and we were constantly meeting or passing natives. The men were usually dressed in white, sometimes with broad Spanish sashes around their waists, and sat upon their little horses, in front of great panniers filled with fruit and vegetables.

The little houses or shacks of the natives are constructed of poles covered with palm leaves or bark, and are raised above the ground upon posts. Before the American occupation, the cabins usually contained no furniture whatever, as the Spanish Government taxed every article of luxury.

Now many of them have a table and a chair for each member of the family. Cooking is done with charcoal, in a lean-to at the side of the house. The faded green and brown color of these shacks blend with the landscape when seen at a distance, and they are at first glance invisible.

Lunch was served in a Spanish hotel in Cayey. It was soon evident, on resuming the journey, that the grade was steeper, and the course of the road on the mountainside became more tortuous. At one point I peered down perhaps a thousand feet into a valley.

Arrived upon the summit of the Aibonito Pass, there was revealed a scene of entrancing beauty. Green mountain peaks rose majestically, their rugged heads high in the clouds, whose piled-up, fleecy masses enveloped some of them in showy caps, with delicate, lacelike draperies.

The descent proved to be of the wildest. The carriage was supplied with a brake, which the driver manipulated as the vehicle rattled down the steep grade, the little horses running at top speed to keep out of its way. As we came to the sharp curves, of which there were many, some skirting unguarded precipices, the driver handled the horses most skilfully, and, though the turns were sharp, the impulse of the forward momentum overcame any tendency to sway. In short, he appeared not to give us time to upset. The old Spanish military road is so perfect that this was all done without a jar.

One of the surprises of the ride occurred very near its close, when our team plunged into water at full tilt. The side-lights of the carriage revealed water all about us. The driver urged his horses forward and I realized it was a ford. As we kept along the valley, a cluster of brilliant lights shone out in the distance. "Coamo Springs," said the driver, and the famous old inn was before us.

It has been hinted that had Ponce de Leon discovered Coamo Springs, the rejuvenating powers of the springs might readily have led him to believe that his long quest for the fountain of perpetual youth had at last been rewarded.

Abraham and the Persian

A Legend from the Ancient Hebrew Writers.

ONE of the most beautiful legends of olden times is that in which God rebukes the patriarch Abraham, who in his zeal to "do justly" fails to "love mercy," as the Lord has required of his followers from the beginning.

The tale runs that a weary Persian traveler of great age, finding Abraham sitting without the door of his tent upon the eve of a storm, besought permission to enter and refresh himself. The patriarch welcomed him with gracious hospitality.

Soon the storm burst, and even as its violence increased, Abraham sank into a stern silence. The traveler, having finished his repast, tremblingly requested shelter through the night. "Not in this tent," replied Abraham; "thou art a thankless unbeliever. I have watched thee, and though thou hast eaten, thou hast not offered a word of praise to God, who feedeth us all." The old Persian declared himself a worshiper of the god of fire, saying: "I must wait until the morning, when the sun rises in the heavens," and plead for shelter in the name of his hundred years, his wife and children, and the fearful storm without. But the righteous patriarch was immovable. "Thou art a blasphemer," he answered; "in this tent thou canst not stay."

No sooner had the aged pilgrim tottered forth into the storm, than Abraham felt fear awaken within him, and out of the silence a voice which he knew to be that of the Almighty spake unto him, demanding knowledge of the stranger who had sought shelter there. "I have borne with his unbelief a hundred years," said the voice of the Lord, "and couldst not thou bear with him one night?" Humbly and in sorrow Abraham accepted the rebuke, learning well the lesson that not man but God himself is "the Judge of all the earth." The legend goes on to picture the protecting power which had wrapped the aged traveler about as he fared forth into the night, leading him to rest within a corner of the tent, with a young lamb for a pillow.

When morning came Abraham expressed his penitence to the waking Persian, tenderly relating to him the great mercy and kindness which the one true God had bestowed alike upon believer and unbeliever.

Make Money in Texas Land

Today all eyes are turned toward Northern Texas, which is on the eve of the most remarkable agricultural development in history.

This rich, fertile land has been held by cattle raisers many years, but the growth of the great Southwest, the strong demand for farm land and new conditions in the cattle business have suddenly thrown it on the market. It is very cheap now but doubling in value annually because thousands of newcomers are eagerly swarming into this Land of Promise.

The Colony Farm Homes Association has opened a tract of 25,000 acres in the productive Washita and Red Deer Valleys in Hemphill County. This superb land, with the new townsite of Mendota on the Santa Fe Railway as a center, is being sold to investors and homeseekers at from $8 to $18 an acre and upon very easy terms, in some cases less than 4 cents a week per acre. Cultivated land adjoining is worth $50 an acre now. Abundant rainfall. No alkali. No irrigation. No fertilizing. Big crops. Healthful climate.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway has such confidence in this territory that it is spending millions of dollars on new roadbed, bridges, etc., preparatory to the big traffic sure to develop in that territory.

If you want to make an absolutely safe and surely profitable investment, or if you want to get a farm home very easily in what will be the "Garden of the United States" in a few years, write today for handsome free illustrated book "Mendota Colony Farms," describing the opportunities in Northern Texas now.

Refuge in Trouble

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THREE days after the Israelites had sung the song of victory on the wilderness side of the Red Sea, their faith was tried, for they found no water. Would the wonderful experiences of the past lead them to exercise such faith in God as to endure quietly until deliverance was granted them? Alas, no; they fell again under the power of "things which are seen" and "temporal." Arriving at Marah and finding the waters bitter, they "murmured against Moses, saying, 'What shall we drink?'" Moses did what they ought to have done: he cried unto the Lord and the waters were soon made sweet for them.

There at Marah, by the healed waters, God "made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them, and said, 'If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord that healeth thee'" (or the Lord thy Physician). The ordinance for Israel was obedience, God's pledge was to heal them. Accordingly we find it written of the people who came out of Egypt, "there was not one feeble [sick] person among their tribes" (Ps. 105:37), and again, "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years" (Deut. 8:4). In respect of all their needs the Lord made himself responsible; for their safety, for their guidance, for their health, their clothing, and their food, they might have said with David, "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want" (Ps. 23:1).

And yet, again and again we find them murmuring. God tried them, and proved them to know what was in their heart (Deut. 8:2), and he found there a depth of unbelief only equaled by that of the majority of his people in our day. Looking upon outward circumstances, it was a very great trial of faith to the children of Israel to find themselves in the wilderness, where no corn grew and no food could be obtained either by working for it or by paying for it. Judging by appearances the mothers must see their children die of hunger before their eyes, and the strong men who were ready to work were incensed against Moses and Aaron, when they saw no possibility of procuring bread for their families, and thus they vented their indignation: "Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the fleshpots, and when we did eat bread to the full; for ye have brought us into this wilderness to kill this whole assembly with hunger."

There was nothing wrong in asking for bread; God says, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me" (Ps. 50:15). But the spirit in which they acted reflected upon God and upon Moses; it was unbelief and not faith. They despised and made light of the glorious distinction which God had created between them and the Egyptians, and spoke as though the consequences of trusting God were more fatal than those of rebelling against him. Yet God in his tender love passed over their sin, and supplied their need without so much as rebuking them. "The Lord said unto Moses, Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you." God's storehouses are not confined to earth; his resources are wider than the universe itself, for his power is creative; why then doubt him?

And yet how many there are who suffer need, and when they pray, do so in a despairing, hopeless manner, as though they took it for granted that God would not hear them, instead of praying in confident expectation, counting upon God as having made himself responsible, by his very name of Father, for the real needs of all his children.

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market about ten weeks ago it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom have given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is "Unseen Comfort." GATHERING CHILDREN OF THE TENEMENTS FOR AN OUTING AT MONT-LAWN

Wm. F., Jr., Rahway, N. J. Where is the "City of Fools," and why is it so called?

It is the little town of Gheel, in Belgium, twenty-seven miles from Antwerp, which bears this odd appellation. A great number of demented people of the harmless type are boarded there in inns and dwelling-houses. They are not restrained, unless they become suddenly violent, but are rather humored by their attendants. They have the fullest freedom and walk about the town. Many cures are said to result from this method of treating the insane.

Jere B., Detroit, Mich. Daniel's comet, so-called, was first observed by Prof. Zaccheus Daniel at Princeton, June 9. It is moving toward the sun at the rate of twenty miles per second, and may soon be visible at night to the naked eye.

J. L. W., Worcester, N. Y. Is it true that the body of the Pharaoh of the Exodus has been found?

If, as we are forced by history to believe, the Pharaoh who pursued the Israelites was Merenptah, son of Rameses II., it is clear that he was not drowned as the Israelites supposed, for his body has been found regularly embalmed. The dates on his sarcophagus show that he lived some years after the Exodus. All that we know of his character indicates that it would be like him to send his army on in the pursuit, and himself remain secretly with his guard in safety on dry land. The Israelites would naturally suppose that as he was leading his army he perished, but it was quite possible and characteristic of the man to avoid the labor and danger of the march into the bed of the sea.

G. W. R., Indianapolis, Ind. How many are there in my class of working people—men and women, boys and girls—who work for wages, from twenty-five cents up to a dollar and a half a day?

The whole army of unorganized labor must be a very large one, reaching far into the millions. To obtain reliable data on the subject, write to the United States Bureau of Labor, Washington, D. C.

B. H. W., Williston, S. C. In a sermon recently, a minister said that King Solomon, in all his glory, did not dress as well as ordinary people of the present day—that he had gold and silver, but not fine clothes. What is his authority for such a statement?

No statement of the kind can be maintained. The robes of monarchs in ancient times, while differing from those of our own time, were no less magnificent and costly, both as to texture and quality of materials, workmanship and ornaments. Descriptions left by ancient writers and the results of antiquarian research make this certain. According to the descriptions in the oldest writings, Solomon drew upon the whole artistic world of his time for his rich and picturesque surroundings, and this applied to the palace as well as the temple and to all the king's personal belongings.

A. J. S., Chicago. 1. Is it recorded that certain Jews advanced money to Columbus to defray the expenses of his first voyage or any subsequent voyage? 2. Is it a fact that the sailor who first sighted land was a Jew?

1. See answer to I. I. M., Natchez, Miss., in MAIL-BAG, June 5 issue. 2. The discoverer was Rodrigo de Triana, a common sailor on the Nina. Prof. Charles Gross, of Harvard, the translator of a book by Dr. Moses Kayserling on "Columbus and the Participation of the Jews in the Spanish and Portuguese Discoveries," claims that Rodrigo was a Jew. He adds that a nephew of Gabriel Sanchez, the Hebrew who advanced the money, accompanied the expedition, also that the ship's doctor, Bernal, the surgeon, Marco, and another sailor, Alonso de la Calle, were all Jews. Finally, he asserts, Luis de Torres, the interpreter, who was the first to be set ashore on American soil by Columbus, was a Jew.

Davids, Binghamton, N. Y. How long a time was it from Malachi to the coming of Christ?

B.C. 410 is believed by the leading commentators to be nearly correct. Vitringa gives Malachi's prophecies the date of 420 B.C. He was probably contemporary with Nehemiah.

Mrs. Powell-Cotton Among the African Pigmies

MRS. POWELL-COTTON, wife of Major Percy Horace Gordon Powell-Cotton, a well-known ethnographical collector and explorer, has just returned from an adventurous honeymoon spent in the heart of wildest Africa. In order that nothing should interrupt the plans laid for the journey, Major Powell-Cotton's bride left England and journeyed to East Africa, where the marriage took place in 1905. Mrs. Powell-Cotton then accompanied her husband through the pigmy forest, the journey occupying twenty-seven months. The excitement of the pigmies when they first saw the white woman was extraordinary, for they had never previously beheld a white woman. Perhaps the chief source of wonder was her long hair, which for the special benefit of the dwarfs she would let down while they crowded round in speechless wonder. Mrs. Powell-Cotton learned a little of their language and did excellent medical work among them. She was always treated with the greatest respect by the people. The photograph is reproduced from the London Sphere.

A. B., Salem, Ore., Reader, Scranton, Pa., and others. Does the word "baptize" have any other meaning than to immerse? Did the disciples baptize by immersion?

That is clearly the primary meaning. It is possible, however, that it may have been used in other senses. You cannot, for instance, suppose that immersion is intended in John the Baptist's expression, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost" (Matt. 3: 11). The earliest pictures known of the rite are those in the catacombs. In these the candidate stands in the water and the officiating priest pours water on his head. In the "Teaching of the Apostles," or Didache, mentioned by Clement (A.D. 201), the directions for baptism are, to baptize in "living water" if possible. If that is not possible, "baptize in other water; and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm. But if thou hast neither, pour water on the head thrice into the name of Father and Son and Holy Spirit" (chapter 7). The baptism of proselytes, from which the baptism of John the Baptist may have been derived, was probably by immersion.

J. C. D., Lockport, N. Y. You say that none of the Israelites who left Egypt, except Caleb and Joshua, entered the promised land. What became of the tribe of Levi?

They perished with the others. Moses and Aaron belonged to that tribe and if any had been spared it would surely have been they. The children of course grew up and took the place of the fathers, as in the other tribes, otherwise the whole nation would have been wiped out. The explicit statement as to the whole generation is given (Num. 26: 64, 65).

Bessie M., Leavenworth, Kan. We are having some discussion in this locality over the gift of tongues. Will THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tell us about the reliability of the story that a woman in New York, but who comes from the South, has received the gift of tongues and can speak some sixteen or eighteen languages?

No instance of the kind, which can be authenticated, has occurred in New York.

Subscriber, Milford, N. H. How many original colors are there and what are they?

All colors are results of the combination of three primary colors—red, blue and yellow. Combined in twos, they produce the three secondary colors, as blue and red making purple; yellow and red, orange; blue and yellow, green. The grays and browns are compounds of all three of the primary colors, blended in varying proportions.

N. R. B., Atlanta, Ga. What is the population of the British Empire?

Including the recently acquired possessions in Africa, it is 396,968,798.

Mrs. L. H. M., Illinois. 1. What is the "Sorbonne?" 2. Also the "Forty Immortals?"

1. The College of the Sorbonne was founded in 1253, at Paris, by Robert de Sorbon, chaplain of Louis IX. (Saint Louis). At first it was merely a home for students and teachers, but it soon developed into a seat of learning. At the end of the nineteenth century the Sorbonne possessed more than a hundred professional chairs and was attended by more than ten thousand students. 2. The highest of the five academies of which the Institute of France is composed, consists of forty members, known as "the Immortals," a chair in which is the highest honor in the French literary world. Its members are elected for life.

WILL JAPAN BECOME CHRISTIAN?

Or Will Buddhism, Shintoism, and Christianity Combine to Form a New National Religion?

JAPAN is doubtless the most interesting nation in the world to-day. So rapidly is she making progress that the West can scarcely keep track of her developments. Like every nation passing through a formative period, Japan is seething with problems grave and portentous. Religion, too, is an inescapable problem there. It underlies many others, and is the possible solution of them. Westerners have long mistakenly thought of the Japanese as untutored barbarians, eager to receive implicitly and with childlikeness the faith brought by missionary teachers. This is far from being the case. While many splendid Christians have been made in Japan, and there is to-day a vigorous Japanese church, yet the Japanese may be said to desire unadapted Christianity. They want the water of life, but in Japanese vessels. So distinctively nationalistic are they in all matters, that the question of the independence of the Japanese Church from foreign oversight or relations may be said to be the burning issue in religious circles in the Empire.

Times without number it has been said that Japan would impart to the world a new type of Christianity — that, dropping the Western forms into which the Church has fallen, she would give to Christendom a new definition of the faith which originally came from the East. This subject is one that has aroused much little interest among men who give thought to things religious. One manifestation of it, of extraordinary interest, is the startling proposition which is frequently advanced by Japanese, that the nation secure a new national religion by merging into one Christianity, Buddhism and Shintoism. Now, this extraordinary scheme is not the creation of hare-brained theorists. It has been considered seriously in important quarters, and it was originally the suggestion of serious-minded persons. A conference to discuss the proposition was held several months ago in Tokio, representatives of Buddhism, Shintoism and Christianity being present. The matter will come up again at the Parliament of Religions, to be held next spring, in connection with the exposition in the city of Tsu, where the imperial shrines are situated. The topic is thus seen to be really a live, contemporaneous one.

The Great Central Idol of Sanjiusangendo, Kioto

As Count Okuma, the famous statesman, said to me, "Japan is a great absorber." She has throughout her history taken the best from other civilizations, without losing her own identity. Her Buddhism is not the Buddhism of India or China; it has been adapted by Japan. Buddhism and Shintoism have so acted and reacted upon each other that they have come to possess a great deal in common. Many of the Shinto deities have been taken into the Buddhist pantheon. The average Japanese is both a Shintoist and a Buddhist. I have frequently seen Shinto shrines in Buddhist temples, and Buddhist idols at Shinto shrines. The Emperor himself is an illustrious example of this blending of creeds. There is now no State religion in Japan, and religious toleration exists throughout the land; but the Emperor has certain famous Buddhist temples to which he occasionally goes to worship, and within which royal apartments are reserved with great sanctity. On the other hand, the great Shinto shrines, or temples, with equal reason claim his allegiance. The shrines at Tsu are called the imperial shrines, and thither, it will be recalled, the Emperor repaired at the close of the war, along with Marshal Oyama, Admiral Togo and his other leading officers, to give thanks to the spirits of his ancestors for the nation's victories. At the same time he had made a personal gift of $5,000 to the Y. M. C. A. army work; and many Christians have not hesitated to express belief that the Emperor is very favorable to Christianity.

Those followers of Buddha who lecture to fad-loving Americans on the beauties of Buddhism present a very different religion from that which any investigator may find throughout Japan. Here the faith is sheer idolatry and superstition. Not one worshiper in a thousand knows aught of the philosophy of Buddhism, or of its esoteric teachings. Images and charms are the extent of their understanding. For example, I was solemnly assured that the lake on top of the sacred mountain near Hiroshima, where stands an ancient Buddhist monastery, was perfectly clear until a woman looked into it, a few years ago. Until within ten years no woman

Stages of Our Nation's Progress

TEXT: ISAIAH 55: 4

"Behold, I have given him for a witness to the peoples, a leader and commander to the peoples."

THE United States of America is without a parallel in its historical development. To those who read history in the light of divine providence, no country was ever so singularly blessed in its development along the lines of human freedom. It is my purpose this morning to show in what ways the republic in which we live has been marked by four distinct steps along the path of human freedom, which are so plain and unmistakable that any one who has any true thought whatever of God in history must acknowledge his presence in a most remarkable and conspicuous manner. These steps toward human freedom are as follows:

Religious Liberty

I. The step into freedom to worship God. No matter what limitations surrounded the Pilgrim, or what narrow misconception he might have had of the kingdom of God in the heart of him, his moving to New England and founding the Massachusetts Colony was for the express purpose of breathing the air of religious liberty. And all New England, from the colony of 1621 down to the present moment, has shared in the heritage of that purpose. Any other beginning of that colony would have stamped the thinking of New England, and consequently of the thirteen colonies, with an entirely different theology, and given to the beginning of things an entirely different trend.

There were three things which the Pilgrim Fathers impressed on this country that have remained to the present day. Those were, the need of the church as an institution in the community, the necessity of the schoolhouse as an adjunct to it, and the democratic institution known as the town meeting. It is a pardonable pride for the Congregationalists of this country to remember that the nearest approach to a purely democratic government of the people for themselves, was inaugurated by a Congregational minister who was the author of the town meeting in New England, out of which has grown all that is best in popular government in the States and the nation. Every one of these institutions, church, school and popular government, was in the line of freedom from ecclesiastical tyranny in the old country, a restricted and class education, and the domination of the aristocracy or the monarchy over the people at large.

The United States, therefore, is unique among all the nations of the world on account of its beginnings. This great step of the colonies toward freedom marked an era in human advancement; and with all the mistakes, the selfishness and the sins of the time which has followed, this republic still retains at its heart that idea of the Pilgrim Fathers. The first great step in freedom has not been retraced. It was providential, and providential things do not go backward.

Political Freedom

II. The second great step toward freedom in the development of this country was marked by a period of revolutionary conflict. It was not the amount of taxes imposed on this country by England that caused the revolt against the mother country. We are taxed far more heavily to-day by the trusts and by unjust systems of local and State taxation, than England ever taxed us; but it was the principle of the thing, marked by its absolute injustice, which caused the revolution. In the providence of God, the nation now took another step toward freedom. Inasmuch as the human race has not, even after two thousand years of Christ, learned how to get freedom along the peaceful path, much blood was shed during the process, but the step was taken and has never been retraced. It is a long time now since England herself saw the hand of Providence in it. The Declaration of Independence marked an era in human advancement. It has had no parallel in history. There was nothing in the life of other nations to copy. It was of necessity an entirely new departure in the history of nations, but again the providence of God was working in it, and after results have proved the presence of the Divine in our history.

III. The third step toward greater freedom was also marked by bloodshed, but out of it God made the wrath of man to praise him. The Civil War, whatever may have been other causes incident to it in the history of this republic, marks a step towards freedom, not only for ourselves, but for the subject race within our borders. It is of course always a thing to be deplored that human progress should so often be marked by the shedding of blood; but thus far in the history of the world that seems to be the accompanying fact in the case. Again, as in the case of the Revolutionary War, the product of the Civil War has been a step up higher in human freedom. In spite of the fact that the negro in some parts of the South is disfranchised, his human freedom in the large and essential matter has been secured and he can never again be in any large sense a chattel; and the time will come in this country when his constitutional rights at the ballot box will be assured to him.

Social Freedom

IV. The fourth great step toward freedom is in our own times; and it is marked by three great struggles of the nation toward higher liberty, viz., first, the struggle for freedom from the dominion of mammon; second, the struggle for freedom from the dominion of the saloon; and third, the struggle for freedom from the dominion of traditions, forms, man-made creeds and doctrines in the church.

The struggle which is now going on for freedom from the rule of mammon takes different forms, all of them hopeful for the future. The protest going on all over this republic against the selfishness of commercial highwaymen, the civic struggle for freedom from tyranny in the management of city affairs, the heroic fight which is being waged in many places against the foolish and harmful excess of luxury, are all signs of the new step in freedom which is characterizing the present upheaval in the life of this nation.

The victories which are being won in nearly every State in the Union for law and order, as against the lawlessness and disorder created by the liquor business, is a sign of the other step toward freedom which the nation is making. And the very fact of readjustment of the church life, the demand for saner and more reasonable evangelistic efforts, the refusal on the part of the people to accept a certain type of doctrinal teaching which does not emphasize the love of God and the reality of Christ, are all marks of a larger sense of human greatness and a desire for more freedom.

These four great steps in freedom, then, have marked the history of this nation up to the present moment. I repeat in order to emphasize. They are, freedom to worship God, without which no nation can ever endure; freedom to govern ourselves; freedom for all men alike; and freedom from any kind of tyranny of wealth or passion or prejudice which could keep the people enslaved or darkened. These are the steps which so far have been providential in our national existence.

Leaders in Each Crisis

It has also been a marked fact in our national history that at crises in each one of these four steps toward freedom men have been raised up who were leaders, men distinguished for certain great qualities and providential for the time. It is necessary to mention only such men as the early Pilgrims, like Bradford and others, who put the stamp of their individual convictions on the early colonies and emphasized the great principles that led to their coming; such men as Washington during the second period, who had an abidding trust in the God of nations; such leaders as Lincoln in the third period, who were also providential men; and in our present time history will record leaders who have arisen to show the people the way into the larger liberty along the track of freedom from wealth despotism, from slavery to passion, and slavery to human custom and dogma. It is evident to any one who thinks concerning the crises of history in America, that if it is to continue making progress in these various steps in human liberty, it must continue to furnish leaders for the people. The qualifications for leadership which belong to the future of this country are, in brief:

First. Convictions. We shall always need, as we have needed in the past, men and women with tremendous convictions of right and wrong, who have gone past the stage of questions concerning very many t[hings] and are able to feel positively without debate the [rightness] of certain things for the welfare of the country. [No] one can be a leader who has not the most [profound] convictions in matters concerning the welf[are] of the people at large. And there will always be p[lenty] of opportunity for men and women with these q[uali]ties; who in the face of great national perils feel d[eeply] the wrong and long with passion to set it right.

Brave Men Needed

The second qualification is courage. Dr. Ch[arles] Frederic Goss in his recent book entitled Husband, [Wife] and Home, speaking of the courage needed in the [great] battle of life, mentions the ease with which some p[eople] run away from all difficulties, and tells the story [of] a soldier in the Civil War who, during a reverse in [the] battle, was seen by his colonel making a hasty re[treat] toward the rear, running as fast as he could. [His] colonel shouted after him, "What are you running [away] for?" And the man replied, as he continued runn[ing], "Because I can't fly." There are so many cowar[dice] in the human conflict for righteousness that a peculiar [dis]tinction of every leader is that courage which does [not] fail at the time of trial. It has been a trait of e[very] leader in this country who has helped it along the [vari]ous steps toward freedom, that he has been a ma[n of] marked courage.

Third. Another characteristic of leadership neces[sary] for the growth of this nation into still greater liberty [is] intelligence. Here is a great opportunity for [col]lege-bred men and women to serve their country. [We] need the most intelligent men and women that can [be] found, to enter places of trust and responsibility. [The] pulpit is no place for ignorant good men. We need [the] most intelligent minds in the classroom; in the editor's office; in the political arena. In doing anything [for] the good of mankind, a knowledge of what it needs and of how to apply remedies for ills is an essential qual[ity].

Educated Men

The leaders we have a right to expect from the you[ng] men and women growing up at the present time [are] leaders who have consecrated brains. This puts a gr[eat] value on education, a thing that the church has [em]phasized in a very marked degree by the extension [of] schools, colleges and seminaries all over this count[ry]. It is again the pardonable pride of the Congregatio[nal] denomination that it has established more colleges a[nd] more institutions of learning in comparison with [its] membership than any other denomination in the Unit[ed] States. And recalling the first step toward freedom [we] are reminded of what was said, that the schoolhouse w[as] considered by the Pilgrim an absolute necessity by t[he] side of the meeting-house. It was not enough to [be] pious; one must be intelligent as well. Not enough [to] be religious; one must be disciplined and trained in t[he] great art of putting truths together so as not to be n[ar]row or bigoted or one-sided.

Fourth. Another characteristic of the leadersh[ip] which we must have for the building up of the repub[lic] is optimism. We must believe in the best. While w[e] see the evil, while we recognize the perils, while w[e] shudder at the failures of democracy, we must not lo[se] faith in God. It is impossible for any one who clai[ms] leadership to help lift the world up if he himself is i[n]clined to look down. No man ever reformed anythi[ng] truly who did not have the happy consciousness of [a] power which was more than his own. Washington ha[d] this in a marked degree, even in the darkest days [at] Valley Forge. Lincoln possessed it even during th[e] darkest period of the Civil War. Men and wome[n] fighting the good fight for freedom at the present time[,] all who are doing anything to solve the preser[nt] problem, are optimistic. There never was a true mi[s]sionary of the cross in the darkest corner of the eart[h] who was not an optimist. The moment he failed to b[e] optimistic, that moment he failed to be a missionary.

Fifth among the characteristics of the leadership w[e] must have, is faith in God and men. Faith in God goe[s] without saying. We have no use for leaders i[n] America who do not believe in God. Any man who ca[n] read the history of this country and read God out of i[t]

MARTYRS OF THE PRISON SHIPS

A MONUMENT TO PERPETUATE THE MEMORY OF THOSE HUMBLE REVOLUTIONARY HEROES

DURING the Revolution, all naval officers and sailors captured as prisoners of war were placed on board one of the prison ships lying in New York harbor. The death-rate from cold, hunger, disease and mortality on these old hulks was very large. The bodies of those who died in the prison ships in the bay were thrown into the water and swept out to sea. The prison ships anchored in the North and East rivers were compelled to bury their dead on the shores of Manhattan.

The largest of the prison ships was the Jersey, which was anchored in Wallabout Basin, near the Long Island shore. Here the bodies of all prisoners were collected daily and buried in the sandpits, where now stands the Brooklyn Navy Yard. About 1800 it was found that the tide had undermined the old sandpits and exposed to public view the remains of large numbers of patriot dead. Benjamin Romaine, a well-known philanthropist of the time, was in the habit of buying sacks of these bones, placing them in coffins and giving them decent interment.

In 1808 the public demanded that the remains of the martyred sailors be exhumed and the bones placed in a new cemetery. A piece of land, on what was then known as the Jackson farm, was reserved specially for this purpose and fenced in on all sides. Here all the remains were buried in caskets, with religious services and military honors. A movement was started for a suitable monument to the memory of these patriots; but the war of 1812, breaking out soon thereafter, discouraged the people and the project was abandoned. In 1873, workmen accidentally uncovered an old sandpit, which was fully the little cemetery of 1808. It had been entirely forgotten. Here were found in a deep trench the remains of a large number of sailors who died on the prison ship Jersey. These were collected and buried in Fort Greene Park. In 1899 and 1901 more bones were found in the Navy Yard, possibly a hundred skeletons in all.

This discovery aroused a deep interest on the part of our leading citizens. A Prison Martyrs' Monument Association was organized and the work of securing subscriptions and selecting plans for the monument was begun. It is now announced that the money for the entire cost of the monument, $200,000, has been secured. The proposed monument was designed by the well known architects, McKim, Mead & White, of Fifth Avenue, New York. It is a shaft of white granite of the Grecian Doric order, surmounted by a handsome bronze urn. It is eighteen feet wide at base and one hundred and fourteen feet in length, and counting fifty feet for the elevation, it will be not less than one hundred and sixty-four feet in height. In the centre of a stairway may be seen a small door, where is a tomb eighteen by eighteen feet, in which will be deposited the bones of the prison ship martyrs.

The Prison-Ship Martyrs' Monument

The monument is to be erected on the upper plateau of Fort Greene near the main entrance to the park, facing the intersection of Myrtle Avenue and St. Edwards Street, Brooklyn, and will be reached by three flights of stairs. The work, it is expected, will be finished in about a year.

The ships on which the prison martyrs were confined were old, useless hulks, where the worst barbarities were practised upon all who were suspected of being in sympathy with the patriots. The ships included the Good Hope, the Scorpion, the Whitehy, the Falmouth, the Prince of Wales, the Stromboli, the Hunter, the Kittie, the Providence, the Bristol, and the Jersey.

During the seven years' war, hundreds of unfortunates were thrown into the Jersey, where they were compelled to live on one meal a day, and that of the poorest kind of food. It was said that they had neither beds nor bedding in summer or winter, and no physician or clergyman was allowed to cheer them in their last hours of suffering. During the seven years' war no less than 11,500 patriots are said to have perished on the Jersey alone. The Long Island Historical Society has a list of over seven thousand names of persons who are known to have died on that vessel. J. J. Munro.

Stages of Our Nation's Progress—Continued from Preceding Page

not fit to be in Congress. I believe we have never had a President of the United States who was an atheist. The best statesmen we have ever had have believed in a divine being. The other faith must be faith in men. All the great leaders in the past history of our nation have believed in the people. Washington, aristocrat as he was by birth and surroundings, had great confidence in the people as a whole and expressed it in many of his public addresses. He had the fullest faith in the rank and file of the army at Valley Forge, the farmers and boys from the country who reddened the snow with blood from their shoeless, stockingless feet. It was to them that he looked for ultimate victory. Lincoln had the most unbounded confidence in the people. His faith in them never wavered. All leaders worthy of the name believe in the people.

Loving Men

A sixth characteristic of true leadership is and always must be love for men. This republic will never take further steps toward liberty as great as those that have marked its past, unless its leaders are genuine lovers of their kind. If the foreign element that pours in on us like a great flood every year is ever assimilated into our freedom, it will be because enough men and women love them to teach them the principles of our institutions. If the rising generation is ever taught the principles of free government as we were taught by our fathers, it must be because enough of the strong and wise and unselfish can be found to repeat what has been done for us. You cannot eliminate this great factor of the love of mankind and have any leader left. You can take away every other quality and leave love in the heart, and still have some strength and hope for leadership, but you cannot take away or leave out of leadership the love of man for mankind and have anything else worth having.

And lastly, at the basis of all true leadership, there must be a profound, passionately religious foundation. In other words, the true leader must be a true Christian; not a nominal Christian, but a real one. And by a real Christian I mean one who tries to put into practice in every department of life the teachings of Christ, whose creed is summed up in supreme love to God and supreme love to man. This is an essential of leadership, and on that basis and on that alone can anything be expected in the way of results for the welfare of this country.

Our public school system and our colleges and universities will produce nothing but educated pagans, who will be no better than uneducated pagans, so far as the welfare of the country is concerned, unless they are permeated with the Christian idea. You cannot build a permanent republic worth having, you cannot expect a nation to grow into a great nation, unless, at the heart of it, there is a most profound and real religious life, a life which is based not on forms and ceremonies and rituals, not on precepts, not on worship and the externals of clothing and incense and pomp and display, but on a religion which is the expression of a heart which loves God and men and wants to do the will of God on the earth. A republic built on such a religious experience and conviction as that is bound to endure. Any other is bound in time to meet with disaster.

The only hope for the permanence of this nation rests upon the religious life in the hearts of the people. And the common people will not be led into this permanent freedom without the presence in this republic of leaders and commanders of the people. Christ was a leader and counselor of the peoples. It was because he possessed all these qualifications that civilization has reached its present high standard. He had every one of the qualities we have mentioned—convictions, intelligence, courage, optimism, faith in God and man, love for mankind, and religious passion. This makes him the leader of leaders and the example for all the world.

True patriotism consists in doing all we can for God and men. If you love your country truly, you must love God and men truly. I heard of a parent the other day who was unwilling that his daughter should become a foreign missionary, because it would remove her from the home where she had been idolized. The father was imperative in his denial of his daughter's request that she might give her life to the people who had not heard of Christ. Can you conceive of anything more short-sighted or selfish than the refusal of a parent to permit his child to serve in the kingdom of God and give the whole life for the good of mankind?

On the other hand, I heard a short time ago of a young woman whose parents were wealthy, who moved in high social circles, who herself had become wearied with the round of social duties, and wished to devote herself to the self-sacrificing work of a nurse in a great city hospital. After long hesitation, she timidly approached her father and mother with her plan for the rest of her life, and was astonished to find that they were ready to have her devote herself to that profession. She is at present because she is doing what she feels God has called her to do and is not one of the useless women of society who are petted and protected from labor by the mistaken and foolish affection of men who think it is a mark of real chivalry to surround wife and daughter with a high fence of luxury, to keep out of the life the most beautiful thing of all that can come into it: the stress and toil of labor for the good of others.

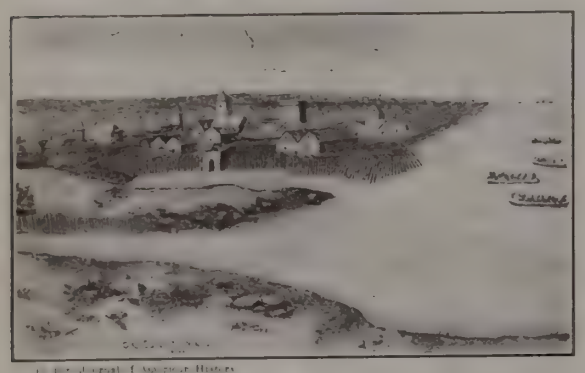
May we not hope that from the Church of Christ there may go out into the world very many young men and women who are fitted to lead the nation into the higher liberty that yet awaits her? Great battles have been fought in the past for us. Men have walked with bleeding steps along bloody paths to give us the freedom we now enjoy. Shall we not do our part also to make possible yet greater liberty for our children's children, by leading all who are yet in the darkness into the light, along whatever path seems to be providential? The God of Nations has been our God, and he will be our children's. We have faith in the destiny which has been so marked by the presence of him who has made our history possible hitherto. In the thought of the future, let us commit ourselves and all who are dear to us to the same leadership. The real heart of this nation is Jesus Christ. He who was made to be a leader and commander for the peoples is our true leader. The divine presence has been prominent in every great step we have taken. We shall never take another forward step as large as those which have been made unless we have the same faith, unless we have the same leadership, inspired by the same divine passion. God save the Republic!

AMERICA'S KNIGHT ERRANT

Captain John Smith, Soldier, Sailor, Explorer, President of Virginia, and Admiral of New Engl



Jamestown in 1622

THREE centuries have passed since the memorable day when English vessels were first moored in the James River, Virginia; the first beams were hewn out for the city of the Royal James, and wild beast and wild man were driven back before the steel of civilization. In spite of the spirit of commercialism which is abroad in the land, in spite of the gigantic waves of heterogeneous immigration which yearly break upon our shores, there are yet thousands of hearts which thrill with patriotic pride at the story of old Jamestown and Captain John Smith.

Bust of John Smith
By General Baden-Powell

Sir Walter Raleigh's disastrous attempts to found a colony in the New World gave the English colonization scheme such a setback that for fifteen years thereafter Virginia lay abandoned. In 1600, Captain John Smith returned to his native country, after years of service in campaigns in France, the Low Countries, Austria, Morocco, Turkey and the Orient. In company with other eminent men and women, he urged the colonization of Virginia to such purpose that on December 19, 1606, three vessels, the God Speed, the Discovery and the Susan Constant, the largest of less than a hundred tons burden, set sail from Blackwall, England, equipped with letters patent issued by King James I. Discarding their first landing-place at Cape Henry, they pushed on up the James River, and on May 13 the infant settlement at Jamestown was established. Brief would have been its existence had it not been for the wise judgment and masterful spirit of Captain Smith, who, although not the acknowledged leader of the expedition, was the moving spirit of the enterprise. He it was who quelled the rising dissensions among the colonists. "He that will not work, neither shall he eat," was his argument with the rebellious. The valiant adventurer met the cruel treachery of the savages with such weapons of friendly conciliation that the Indians were ultimately persuaded to give a supply of corn to the suffering colony.

John Smith, from boyhood, had not known the meaning of fear. During a sally after grain for the young settlement, he was determined to convince the red men of his ascendency and thus reduce them to subjection. Although their number far exceeded his slender following, in reply to their sullen objections he "snatched the King by his long locke and with his Pistolle ready bent against his breast, led him trembling, neare dead with fear," before the terrified aborigines. Some time later he was taken prisoner by the Indians. It was at this time that his life was saved by the intercession of Pocahontas, the king's daughter. A few people have tried to persuade our generation that this did not happen, but the evidence is too strong in its favor. The Indians strove to subdue his dauntless spirit by their weird incantations and hideous outcries; but his courage so impressed Powhatan and the warriors that he was sent back to the settlement in safety. Years later, when Pocahontas, as Lady Rebecca Rolfe, renewed her old acquaintance with Captain Smith in England, she claimed him as her "revered and beloved friend."

The average American, who knows his colonial history accurately, has paid scant heed to the earlier exploits of the man to whose leadership it is fair to ascribe the first permanent English settlement in the New World. Historians say that "had the expedition that came to Jamestown in 1607 failed of a permanent footing, England, discouraged already by Raleigh's disastrous failures, might not have again attempted to establish an Anglo-Saxon colony." Smith himself said: "The wars in Europe and Africa taught me how to subdue the wild savages of Virginia."

Born in Lincolnshire in 1579, the lad lost his parents at an early age, and almost immediately embarked upon his career as a soldier of fortune. It is chronicled that, born of a fighting and seafaring race, the boy's spirit refused to brook restraint, and that he ran away from the training as a respectable merchant for which his guardian had destined him. From England to France, from France to the Low Countries he wandered, drawing his sword under many flags, but always holding that the "true condition of war is to suppress the proud and defend the innocent and humble." The youth followed now the white plume of Henry of Navarre, and again espoused the cause of the Prince of Orange against the tyranny of Spain. He was a scientific soldier and studied to devise new methods of attack and defense. He invented a system of signaling by torches, not unlike the heliograph of a later day, which proved of great value. The seventeenth century standards of uprightness were far different from those of our own day, but at last even John Smith grew weary of "seeing so many Christians slaughter one another," and was fain to take service under Rudolph of Austria, who was sending forth his armies to repel the Turkish barbarians in their invasion of Hungary. "For," said Smith, "it would surely be no crime to slay the enemies of Christ." The army to which he was soon attached encamped upon the plains of Hungary and immediately set to work to intrench themselves against assault. It is related that the Turks watched them from the town which they occupied; their pasha finally sending a challenge to any Christian not lower in rank than a captain, to engage with him in single combat for his head. The challenged officers were all so eager to accept that they drew lots. The lot fell upon Captain John Smith.

The lists in which the champions were to do battle were marked off below the walls. The people of the city swarmed upon the ramparts and other points of vantage. Below them on the plain the Christian soldiers were drawn up, the shifting lines sparkling in the sun. Their commander sat in state in his pavilion, from which floated heavily embroidered banners.

"THE FOURTH" AT MONT-LAWN

How the Nation's Birthday Will be Celebrated at Our Children's Home

ONE of the leading American magazines for July makes the statement that "the lower East Side tenement section in New York City is the most densely populated district on the round earth." There is a keen joy in realizing that this packed mass of humanity in the "under-world" is lessened by at least two hundred and fifty children who were taken from the stifling rooms of the baking alleys, and carried to a beautiful home in the country called Mont-Lawn. What a blessed, heartwarming sense of satisfaction comes to the kindly, generous supporters of those children, because they have each done their own noble share toward making Mont-Lawn possible!

Yes, the Children's Home is open, and it is hard to tell which was uppermost in our hearts on the day the happy children first started from the Bible House—joy that such a merry throng were on their way to the unknown delights which awaited them, or sorrow that, down in the horror of unsanitary area and street, thousands more were sitting, leaning weary heads against the door, too tired either to work or play. One boy, in answer to a sympathetic query, said: "There ain't no school, it's vacation, and I've got to help mother. Lots o' kids roun' here are gorn to the country."

But there were no vain regrets in the minds of the happy pleasure-seekers. From train to ferry trotted the chattering, excited throng, clambering like a swarm of ants over the wheels and sides of the capacious wagons which had been sent to meet them. Away they went rumbling through the train and up the hillside toward the goal of their hearts' desire.

Perhaps none of the ever-changing groups of summer sojourners is more pathetically full of interest than the first "Fourth of July" consignment, for we try to select from the host of early child-applicants such as seem most piteously in need of the reviving influences of the pure air and wholesome regimen which Mont-Lawn affords. From the minute the first pair of bright eyes spied the peak of the flagstaff until the big wagons settled in under the arch of the great entrance-gate, a wild clamor of eager exclamation echoed through the quiet twilight of the country road. It seemed as if the approach to the new world of freedom and beauty which was about to open before the expectant gaze of the little strangers had almost intoxicated them with bright visions of the wonderful new life. But when the scores upon scores of child-figures were deposited upon the broad, graveled drive before the hospitable veranda of the main house, and the cheery greetings of the little house-mother and her staff surrounded them with the sweet atmosphere of home and love, the childish voices grew strangely silent, and the childish faces shone with a new light as the perfection of the scene and the womanly tenderness of the group of teachers penetrated to their receptive hearts.

Next morning every child was stirring with the dawn. Only one Sunday then came busy jolly preparations for the "glorious Fourth." A Fourth of July in the country was a wonderful idea to many of Mont-Lawn's small guests, into whose pinched faces the tinge of health was already creeping, and whose parched, cracked little feet were growing supple and firm by frequent dips in the sparkling brooklet under the old apple-trees.

At last these waifs of the street, offshoots of every nation under the sun, were to learn what a real, patriotic, hilarious Independence Day celebration means! If they never loved the old flag before, they were taught to love it now, to honor and reverence its every gleaming fold. "God and our country" is the watchword for Mont-Lawn's "Fourth," and the ringing songs of fealty and praise to "God and home and native land" rise and fall in joyous cadence.

"Saluting the Flag" at Mont-Lawn

'Tis the "children's own day" at Mont-Lawn, and matron and caretakers, Christian Herald office representatives, and the numerous guests whose presence goes so far to make the day a prominent feature in the whole season, all unite in making every hour a shining link in the chain of childhood's memory.

The programme of former years will be somewhat varied by new speakers, new songs, new teachers, and, best of all, new children. We will not dilate too much upon the preparations for that truly American holiday, because the story must not be a twice-told tale when we live the experiences of the glad day over again in making word-pictures of its varied programme for our many interested friends and patrons. As always, Mont-Lawn keeps open house for its friends, who come from far and near to look on at the children's long day crowded full of delights. The arrival of the big wagon-loads of "grown-ups" is heralded by hearty cheers; the admirably prepared Temple exercises are given with even more than their usual gusto; the material feast of good things which is spread for the guests only after their small army of youthful hosts have eaten their fill, the refreshing cakes and ices served on the broad slopes of the tree-shaded lawn, all in their turn are a joy to the eye and a fragrant memory to store away in the beholder's mind. The flag drill, the marches and salutes, the brilliant fireworks which crown and complete the day so dear to every true American, these must be seen to be even half understood and appreciated. But an interested participant in the festivities of that perfect day hopes to tell its story to the friends of The Christian Herald Children's Home.

Before the season grows older, we want to share with the great family to whom the happenings at Mont-Lawn are of vital interest, what seems a subject for special thanksgiving to those who for so many years have had the well-being of the Children's Home very closely at heart. Since its inception there have been approximately 25,000 children from the lowest stratum of poverty gathered within the shelter of its walls. Yet during all that time, so wonderfully has the Almighty Father held this work for little children beneath the shadow of his wing that not one child has died during its sojourn. No railroad accident, no steamboat casualty has occurred, no serious illness has befallen one little guest. Mont-Lawn's friends and patrons have good reason to feel assured that it has the approval of the Master.

COUNTESS SCHIMMELMANN AND THE SAILORS

FROM Countess Adeline Schimmelmann, the founder of the Navy Home at Kiel, Germany, and other work among sailors and fishermen in the Baltic, The Christian Herald has received a short report of last year's work. She says:

"Our Navy Home at Kiel has been a blessing to thousands, for both soul and body. This Home is the only one for the German Navy on Christian and temperance lines. We are glad to state that the 'boys in blue' are allowed to attend the mission, and our workers are also allowed to distribute on board the warships the Gospels and tracts.

"We send Gospel reading matter and our paper, The Light Beacon, to nearly all the ships of the navy and also to the colonies. The emperor and government acknowledge our work. His Majesty gave us seventeen framed pictures for the decoration of our Home, including his full-size portrait, with an inscription. Moreover, his Majesty graciously chose 200 new books for our library, and gave us a contribution of 5,000 marks.

"Connected with this work is our International Sailors' Mission. We have two missionaries, speaking several languages, visiting the foreign ships and giving the Gospel to the sailors. We give them linen bags with Gospel reading.

"Let me picture an incident: An old nobleman, a member of one of the best families, enters and asks a private interview. His son, an officer, is in trouble and the father fears that the son will commit suicide. Can we help? Yes, we say—at least we hope so. We write to one of our band of helpers—a man of God who lives near where the young gentleman resides—and request that he bring the young man in contact with Christian friends who can help him to tide over his difficulties. Especially he must try to bring him to the one great Friend, Jesus.

"Then a heartbroken mother asks us to try and find her lost son. We get his last address and set our helpers to work. The son is found and brought home—like the repentant prodigal.

"A young fireman and a young miner are in danger of consumption. They need mountain air. We are prepared for such cases, and we supply the money for fares, and clothe, lodge and feed them on our private estate. They learn a little farming. After a year, nobody would recognize in those ruddy young fellows, the invalids who seemed like dying men.

"And so, in an unbroken chain, these petitions come to us. Tears are dried, smiles brought to despairing faces and precious souls are won."

GABRIELLE:
THE FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE

by the popular author, MISS ISABELLA MACFARLANE, will appear in our issue of July 17. We believe it will take rank as one of the best stories of the year. It deals with the love and patriotism of the early colonists, and a time of great events in Europe and America.

The pictures that will illustrate the various instalments will be in themselves a great attraction. They are the work of an artist who has illustrated many historical stories by authors of note.

Trouble-Breeders

ARE we as a people becoming unduly excitable and emotional? Is the "foreign infusion" transforming the traditionally cool, level-headed American into a volatile creature, with many characteristics of the impulsive and mercurial Southern European? Such would seem to be the belief of the rumor-makers, who are just now so busily engaged in stirring up strife between this country and Japan. These international romancers seemed to take it for granted that Americans would go into a frenzy of excitement over the fabrications they have been industriously circulating here and abroad, misrepresenting the feeling and attitude in Tokio and Washington.

There has not been even a responsive thrill of the smallest proportions. Japan herself has exploded the mendacities in a semi-official cable dispatch, which pronounced a rupture with America inconceivable, adding that the California incidents were purely local and afforded not the slightest ground for international disagreement. Moreover, the small "jingo" element in the Japanese press has been sternly warned to avoid sensationalism in this connection. This element is opposed to the present conservative administration in Japan, and has lately utilized the San Francisco matter as political capital. As a fitting climax to this whole absurd business, it has been discovered that the rumor-mongers are working in the interest of a clique of immigration agents, who hoped, by creating a "war scare," to bring profit to their trade.

The moral of which is: Don't believe all you read or hear. Distrust croakers who revel in gloomy predictions of impending trouble. Set down rumors of international friction, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, as circulated either in the interest of speculators, to affect stocks or politics, or to achieve a cheap sensation.

Great nations don't go to war over petty local disputes. Great issues must be the stake, and there is none in view at present. Besides, we have clear-brained, sagacious men at the helm of affairs—men to be trusted. So long as this government is conducted on just and righteous principles, giving to other nations their due, and itself asking no more of them, there need be no cause for apprehension for the future.

The Graduates

"IN the bright lexicon of youth, there's no such word as fail." The familiar line springs to the lips as one looks at the great army of graduates who have gone forth recently from high school, college and university to commence their share in the world's work. That is the idea under the husk of the word commencement. The eager, ambitious, disciplined and well-drilled body of young men and women who leave school behind them and enter on a real competition in life is more and more the hope and glory of America. The new generation pushing to the front, finely equipped, ready for the fray, is to take the place of the older ones who are tired, discouraged, or maimed in battle. Wherever we turn we see the glad young faces and ever before them we behold new and inviting opportunities.

> The wrong that needs resistance,
> And the right that needs assistance, alike beckon these new recruits on the battlefield of life.

This summer has seen the addition of a great host to the ranks of professional men and women. More doctors, more lawyers, more journalists, more artists, more men of letters are pressing forward, yearning for the hour when they may make their mark. Notwithstanding the fact that examinations are more exacting than hitherto, and that every year the standards are raised higher and success is more difficult than before, there is no falling off in the numbers of those who receive diplomas and present themselves for work. There will be plenty for them to do. Of old a prophet wrote that the young men should see visions, while the old men dreamed dreams. To the youth who has vision and insight, the trained hand, the deft skill, and the honest heart, there is no note so pertinent as "Excelsior."

Troubles of the Weather Prophets

PROPHETS, ever since the dawn of history, have had a rather uncomfortable time with their neighbors. During the last few months, owing to our peculiar spring, the weather prophets have had a great chance to drop words of wisdom like a cold, damp cloud over a shivering world. One of these gentlemen, who lives in a New England State, and is a prosperous farmer, has been doing a little weather prophecy purely as a side line. He said we would have some cold weather in early June, and no one doubts that he told the truth. Later, he began to hint, it is alleged, that fur caps would be popular headgear in August. At this point people began to get restive under his predictions, and considered him responsible for their ills. Indignant messages began to arrive and the temperature rose in the neighborhood of the prophet's house. He pleaded that other people had been predicting in his name and disclaimed all responsibility for the work of these rash amateurs. He has now decided to retire from the business of weather prophecy. His experience should operate as a wholesome warning to other weather prophets, if they wish to be considered wise, to confine their predictions to the simple method of saying "things had turned out as they expected." It may not increase their popularity to any extent, but they will make fewer mistakes.

The New "Fourth" and the Old

IT is the custom in many places to deplore the passing away of the old-fashioned Fourth of July observance—the celebration on the village green, the stirring music, the fireworks, and the rousing, patriotic speeches. But while the form of observance may have undergone a change, the spirit of the day which marks the birth of our national independence remains the same, and pervades every part of the world, wherever "Old Glory" floats to the breeze. We now celebrate the day in a larger and broader sense than in the past; for it is no longer a restricted or local observance, but a jubilee that extends throughout a great part of the civilized globe.

Our changed social conditions, our vastly increased population, and our new territorial interests on both the Atlantic and Pacific, have all contributed to make of the Fourth of July a day of which Americans may well be proud. How the hearts of the patriot founders would have warmed within them, if they could have seen, in prophetic vision, the mighty multitudes composed of many nationalities, gathering under the folds of that starry flag for which they themselves made such glorious sacrifice! These hosts from other lands have found here, under that flag, freedom and happiness, the security and the opportunities for social progress that were denied them elsewhere. They, too, with all of us, honor the heroic founders of this free republic, and glory in the grandeur of the land which, under God's blessing, has grown to be a great and powerful nation.

The Czar and the Duma

ALTHOUGH less than eighteen months have passed since Emperor Nicholas proclaimed it to be his "inflexible will" to give to the Russian people, peasants included, a satisfactory system of parliamentary representation, according to an "unchangeable rule," his recent dissolution of the Duma shows that such adjectives lose their meaning whenever they come in conflict with imperial policy in Russia. Whatever of truth or fiction may attach to the charge that some fifty members of the Duma were in a conspiracy against the government, and that the guilt of at least one-third of that number was proved to the satisfaction of the authorities, it will be shrewdly suspect by observers of recent events that the Czar's sudden ro- gation of the rule or method he himself had presc d, and which he had pronounced "unchangeable," in reality a panicky surrender to his reactionary ad rs.

True, the Duma just dissolved was apparently a dy of mediocrities. There was not one commanding ti- cal or intellectual figure in the entire assemblage In this sense, it was no doubt a severe disappointm to the friends of constitutional representation. Besid its complex character was a bar to homogeneity. It w a raw, crude body, with many obvious faults; neverth s, it was entitled to a more patient forbearance with its s t- comings. Possibly its successor, to be chosen at he September elections, will be more to the Czar's lik ; but experience has shown that untrained parliament re ticklish and liable to do indiscreet things. Hence, re is no guarantee that the next Duma, should it happ to offend the Czar and his advisers, may not meet th n- glorious fate of the last, and be sent about its bus ss in short order.

Municipal Morals

IT is a good sign when the great cities of our d rise up, one after another, in revolt against n i- cipal corruptionists. San Francisco's experienc is simply a repetition of that of other populous comm i- ties, where those who were chosen to guard the hig t interests, and in whom the fullest confidence was e- posed, proved to be conscienceless plunderers, o regarded public office as a private perquisite. Wi n the last twenty years the avenging broom of Justice s swept many an American city and township clear f these freebooters, and the good work, we are glad o note, still goes on. There are doubtless at the pre t moment many other cities as sorely in need of a m l overhauling and an infusion of civic righteousnes s doubly unfortunate San Francisco.

ussia's New Crisis

GAIN Russia stands on the brink of revolution. The Czar, acting on the advice of the reactionaries, who and distrust popular government, has olved the Duma, the Russian Parliat, and has ordered the election of an-er, on the basis of a restricted suffrage. r some time past it has been evident t the rupture was approaching. The ar has been trying to patch the old garnt with the new cloth, with the usual ult that the rent is made worse. He is aid to trust himself and his untry to representative govment, yet, having given his omise of liberty, he dare not all it. The final crisis came a question of the immunity members of the Duma from rest. Premier Stolypin anunced that the government manded the arrest of sixteen cialistic members and the connt of the Duma to the immeate prosecution of the remaing thirty-seven members of the me section of the party. The arge against the legislators as that they belonged to a cret criminal association, the ject of which was to dethrone e Czar and establish a republc. The evidence consisted ainly in documents discovered a raid on the association's eadquarters, which the governent interpreted as indicating a nspiracy to undermine the yalty of the army. The deand was referred to a committee and before that committee was ready to report, the ecree dissolving the Duma was sued. The arrangements for e election of a third Duma ow a marked change in the asis of suffrage. The right of oting has been restricted in ch a manner as to diminish almost to exnction the representation of the peasants d to make the Duma representative of e upper classes. Thus passes away the pe of the country for a real Parliament d the participation of the people in the nduct of the government. As the prophet id:

He looked for judgment, but behold oppression; r righteousness, but behold a cry. (Isa. 5: 7).

he Flag as a Duster

Popular indignation, which threatened to come riotous, developed recently at range, Mass. The janitor of a factory ilding in that town started to clean the windows of the building. He needed a rag to polish them, and, looking around, noticed an old flag that had seen service and was rather dilapidated. It would serve his purpose and he went ahead with his work. When the workmen in the building discovered that he was using the Stars and Stripes as a window cloth they all dropped work and commanded him to drop the flag. The janitor was much astonished, and resented their ordering him around. It required the peacemaking services of the superintendent of the factory to settle the affair. The janitor was astonished at the demonstration and as the attitude of the men became more threatening he was alarmed. He finally made a full public apology and declared it was merely thoughtlessness on his part, and that he intended no insult to the flag. His explanation was accepted, but it is safe to predict that he will never again use the flag for such a purpose. It is good to know that the flag is thus held in reverence and we may hope that the principles for which it stands may be held as dear as the symbol itself, and that the men who protested may always remember that the honor of the flag may be sullied more seriously by their moral misconduct than by its ignoble use.

Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God because of the reproach of our enemies? (Nehemiah 5: 9.)

Professional Assassination

A story so horrible as to be almost incredible, had it not been told by the criminal himself, has been related in open court at Boise, Idaho. The case on trial is the famous one of the officers of the Western Federation of Miners, who are charged with the murder of ex-Governor Steunenberg. That they did not personally commit the murder is admitted, but the prosecution contends that they hired the murderer, and paid him for committing the crime.

The Jury in the Famous Conspiracy Trial at Boise, Idaho

The State put on the witness stand the actual murderer, a man known as Harry Orchard, who proved to be one of the most remarkable witnesses ever heard in an American court of justice. In the most cold-blooded and imperturbable manner, he confessed that he had caused the death of nineteen persons. He owned that he had followed other prominent men, including Governor Peabody and Judges Gabbert and Goddard, for days, vainly waiting for an opportunity to shoot them; that he had planted bombs in mines which caused the death of several workers, and that he had deliberately shot a detective whom he had followed for two miles. He did not plead that any of those victims had done him personal wrong, but declared that he had acted as the agent of the Federation, and that Haywood and Pettibone, the chief officers of the Federation, had directed him, indicated the men to be killed, and paid him for killing them. That he was paid by some one there can be no doubt. The man was poor, but he was lavish in his expenditures. More than this, it was proved that he was in the confidence of the Federation, and that at various times money had been sent to him at certain places by checks and bank orders for some purpose.

The defense failed to break down the witness by cross-examination, though they compelled him to admit that he was a gambler, a thief and a bigamist. They contend, too, that they can prove that he was not near the scene of some of the crimes he claims to have committed at the time they were committed, and he is falsely accusing himself to incriminate the officers of the Federation. Orchard, himself, gave on the stand a deeply impressive statement of the motives which led him to make his horrible confession. He said he had been thinking over his past life and had concluded that death was not the end, and he was afraid to die. Recognizing what an unnatural monster he had been, he dreaded to appear before God. He had heard from a detective and from the chaplain of the jail that God was merciful and that he would forgive him, as he had other vile criminals, if he repented. He declared that he had received no promise of pardon from the authorities of the State as a reward for confessing, but he believed it was his duty to tell the truth regardless of consequences to himself or others.

His testimony, of course, will require corroboration before it is accepted against the defendants, and the jury will doubtless listen attentively to the evidence that will be given to prove the innocence of the accused. It is difficult to believe that any organization of American citizens could deliberately plan those cold-blooded murders, and still more difficult to believe that any man would falsely accuse himself of crimes so appalling. The jury has a difficult duty to perform and we trust it will be divinely guided.

It is a joy to the just to do judgment but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity (Prov. 21: 15.)

A Human Brick

Probably the most eccentric disposition ever made of a human body was that directed by a suicide recently in Boston, Mass. He had fallen into a condition of melancholy, in which he became distressed about what would happen to his body after death. In a note he wrote shortly before taking his life, he said that his intellect longed for life, but his body was weary and pined for death; but he feared that his body after death would have renewed life in a shrub which would grow from it. The thought of sinking back into the vegetable kingdom, in which he might have feeling and yet not sentient perception, was repulsive to him; so he studied out a way of avoiding the fate. He found at last a method that satisfied him. He left instructions to have his body cremated and the ashes mixed with sufficient cement to form solid rock. His order was carried out. The cement and ashes were moulded in a square box and before they finally set an inscription was pressed into them, stating his name, the date of his death and the motto, "Let me rest in peace." The human brick was taken to a cemetery in Boston for interment, but the cemetery managers declined to receive it. So eccentric a request was clearly the evidence of an unsound mind. A sensible man would not have been afraid of anything growing from his body after his death, though he might have dreaded the effect of the influence of his moral life on those who had observed it while he lived.

Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you and thereby many be defiled. (Heb. 12: 15.)

A Canine Letter-Carrier

A novel device was employed by a wife recently to communicate with her missing husband. The couple were married four years ago at New Brunswick, N. J. Of late they had some difficulties and finally the husband left home and did not return. His wife sought him but could not find any trace of him. A pet dog had accompanied the man, and one day the dog reappeared alone at the home. It looked around the house for a time and then disappeared. The wife, thinking the phenomenon over, concluded that her husband had taken the dog out and had lost it, and that the dog, being confused, had gone to its former home instead of to the new home of its master. The same thing happened a few days later, and the wife put into execution a plan she had devised. She attached to the dog's collar a note expressing a desire for reconciliation. She said she had been driven to this peculiar method of communication by her failure to discover her husband's residence. Unhappily the note failed to bring about a reconciliation. The husband was obdurate and the deserted wife commenced suit for divorce. Perhaps the wife would have done better to follow the dog and make her appeal in person. It was, however, significant that she should have been so sure of the dog's fidelity as to send her letter by him. It would be well if the world had similar confidence in the Christian's fidelity to his God, and to believe that by following him they might find God.

We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. (Zech. 8: 23.)

OUR RELIEF SHIP'S VOYAGE

*Incidents on the Journey to Nagasaki — How the "Buford" Saved 37 Lives — Avoiding a Typh*n

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

AS if the winds and waves recognized the greatness and the loving-kindness of the Buford's mission, they have been almost uniformly kind throughout the voyage, "kind" in the great Pacific meaning "still."

After landing the Congressional party in Honolulu, there were about thirty first-class passengers left on the steamer, most of them with an army connection and bound for Manila. There were five young lieutenants, one of them brother to the Captain James who was so cruelly boloed by the Filipinos a year ago. He goes to his late brother's regiment, and goes largely through the interposition of President Roosevelt. If thoughts of vengeance come and go, he shows no signs thereof; but he will make none the worse soldier in that he has had some of the glamour removed thus early.

With his wife and son, Consul-General Thomas Sammons journeys to Nagasaki, thence to go northward to his new post at Seoul, Korea. Mr. Sammons was Consul-General at Newchwang, the chief port of Manchuria, throughout the Russo-Japanese war. His experiences by stricken mart and field were of the truly strenuous sort, and the experiences he gained were valuable, as his widely published state papers attest. Mrs. Sammons was the first white woman to reach Mukden after its capture by the Japanese, and few women have seen as much of war's alarms as she.

It is good to know that the stanch ship Buford is already consecrate in the work of saving lives—formerly, as now, the lives being those of Orientals, and then, as now, Captain Frank Hall being the master of the ship. Captain Hall told me the story last Monday night as we walked the bridge and watched the ship shatter the radiance made by the moon on the crumpled waters west of us.

It was half-past nine ("three bells" as he put it) on the night of Wednesday, February 7, 1906. Under orders for San Francisco via Honolulu, the Buford was steaming through a dirty sea. It was not stormy, but the waters gave every evidence that there had been a big blow to northward. Suddenly, from the forward bridge came the hail:

"Flare light off the port bow!"

A glance to windward showed the captain and his mates, who were quickly on the main bridge, a small but distinct flame, rising and falling on the waves, now and again hidden by some over-topping crest. A light like that in mid-ocean could mean but one thing -an appeal for succor—and instantly Captain Hall ordered a starboard helm and made straight for the distant flare.

Within ten minutes the night glasses defined a barkentine, badly battered by stress or storm, riding low in the water, and evidently not long for the upper air. A few moments more and the steamer was within hail, while her officers could count thirty-seven Japanese huddled on the poop and waving frantically. To a shout from the Buford they answered with undistinguishable cries, but their dire need was plain enough. A boat was lowered and, under command of the first officer, made safe passage, through a heavy sea, to the stricken vessel. The Japs had one boat left, and in that and the Buford's cutter they were soon taken on board the steamer—"the thankfulest lot of fellows you ever did see," said Hall in his telling.

The barkentine proved to be the Tusnemoto-Maru of Yokohama, which, four days out from that port, had run into a storm of ferocity sufficient to dismantle the vessel to the unmanageable point. Later the barkentine sprung a leak which kept the men constantly at the pumps—hopelessly as well, since the water gained hourly and all they could do was to postpone the inevitable. To add to their miseries all their fresh water tanks were either washed overboard or so damaged that the sea-water mixed with the fresh and left an undrinkable compound. They had plenty of food, but their sufferings from thirst, as described by Captain Murakami, who spoke English fairly well, must have been terrible. They had been driven off main traveled sea-roads to latitude 32 degrees 30 minutes north and longitude 155 degrees east (about 750 miles south by east from Yokohama), and the flare sighted by the Buford was their last chance, their final hope.

Their gratitude to Hall and his men was that of those lifted in a moment from despair to joyful life. He took them to Honolulu, where they transshipped to a Pacific liner westward bound, and in due time reached home.

The news of the rescue was bruited abroad in Japan and a few months thereafter Captain Hall was tendered the thanks of the Mikado and his government for what was, in fact, a gallant rescue, since the sea was such as to make it no easy matter to take off the crew from the sinking ship.

More to Captain Hall, however, than the official thanks, was a letter from the rescued captain, mailed in Tokio in the March following, and of which the following is a transcript:

Tokyo Japan
Mr. 20th. '06.

MR. HALL

Der Sir,

If I could do all the ways to thank you for your kaindness that you did us when we were meeting with a danger or calamity and let us keep our life, how we shall feel satisfaction?

We shall remember your kindness forever, confiding that you are mother of our life.

When you come to Japan, if you will call us, we will meet you with the most glad.

With much respect

We are Yours truly
CAPTAIN H. MURAKAMI. and other hands on the Tusnemoto-Maru.

Now, mark one of the sea's grim jokes. Last Tuesday, May 21, or more than fifteen months after the rescue, we were about one hundred and fifty miles west of the spot, when, from my seat on the promenade deck, I saw a flash of something white about a mile off the port bow. It wasn't a gull—too big—nor a porpoise—too white. What was it? I hailed the bridge, and the glimmering mystery was soon descried by the officer on watch. By Captain Hall's orders we made for it and discovered it to be one of the water-tanks from the Tusnemoto-Maru. Both ends of the big wooden cylinder had been staved out by the waves, and the lower part was thick with barnacles, whose weight kept the tank half upright. It was a gruesome reminder of mid-ocean perils, and as we left it far astern, bowing serenely on the long swells, the thoughts of all turned to that night so many months ago, when these same waters saw a tragedy averted, and by the same ship that is now carrying the literal bread of life to hundreds of thousands of starving Orientals.

It was four o'clock on the morning of Thursday, May 23, when we sighted Japanese territory -the first land we had seen for fourteen days. It was Aoka Sima ("Sima" or "Shima" means "island" in Japanese), a tiny and bleak uplifting of land, two hundred and fifty miles south of Yokohama, and as unimportant as it is isolated. Thursday was not so pleasant as its sunlighted predecessors, and by 10 P.M. the rain was torrential and the barometer low at 29.65, while the heavy winds seemed to come from all points of the compass at once and the sea grew angrily turbulent as the mercury went down and still down.

"It's the edge of a typhoon," said Captain Hall, "and as it's a deal better to be sure than sorry, I'll put about and get a higher, or stationary, baro and steadier winds. I'm not going to take any ch of shipping a lot of heavy seas and wetting the fi

Backward we turned, and in two hours and a got the stationary barometer we were after. Slo down for a few hours we took the westward track a and on Friday ran into swells that marked the pow the typhoon we had missed by reason of the capt wise retrogression.

Saturday was ideal, and by 9 A.M. the highl of Kiushu, the southernmost of Japan's proper re were in plain view on the starboard bow. The day a delight. We were near enough to shore to pick the terraced plantations and the new conifers mark a systematic plan of reforestation. On the hand the big and populous island of Tanega sho dimly; dead ahead was Iwo-Shima, an active vole rising 2,300 feet out of the sea and crowned with of steam; while to starboard loomed the castell Satamisaki, Japan's Cape Horn, crowned with a li house and a wireless telegraph mast. The flag of Rising Sun dipped in salute to the Buford's S and Stripes as we passed, and we knew that in a hours Shanghai and Chinkiang would know of our proach.

Before five o'clock this morning a blast from Buford's "big seven" reverberated from and among hills that hem the harbor of Nagasaki, and was signal for the assemblage on deck of a crowd of pass gers, who seemed to have agreed t "motley's the only wear." A f view of a Japanese port confirm the opinion that here is a people w waste nothing—certainly nothing earth or water. The pocket-handk chief gardens on shore showed more evidences of constant care t did the sculling sampans afloat, a both were for the daily wear and t of life, while the beauty of thi material had not been forgotten in the slightest degree abated.

Quarantine officers were courte self, and one of them hunted me up say that Japan would never forg what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD did her hungry ones in 1906. There naught to do here save to coal—a coal plentifully, for Nagasaki coal twice as good and half as costly as th provided in San Francisco or Honolu —and then make for our destination Chinkiang.

Our port of consignment should reached by Wednesday, and the u loading—which may take six days should be under way by Thursda morning, the 30th instant. E. R. JOHNSTONE.

The Famine Relief Ship on the Pacific

Conditions in the Famine Area

Since the foregoing letter was mailed, the Buford h reached her destination and her cargo has been safel unloaded and distributed.

A cable dispatch from the editor of the North Chi Herald gives the latest news from the famine district as follows:

"SHANGHAI, June 17.

"Conditions are now more satisfactory in a majorit of the districts in the famine area. Growing crops in dicate that people saved seed despite sufferings an starvation all around. There is still much distress, bu it is being effectually met by relief committees with foo and money. There is general appreciation of America help, which aided in keeping famine within limits an stirred officials to activity. Reliable estimates plac death-rate at treble ordinary mortality. Famine feve is widespread."

An Underground City

In Galicia, in Austrian Poland, there is a remarkable underground city, which has a population of over 1,000 men, women, and children, scores of whom have never seen the light of day. It is known as "the City of Salt Mines," and is situated several hundred feet below the earth's surface. It has its town hall, theatre, and assembly room, as well as a beautiful church, decorated with statues, all being fashioned from the pure crystalized rock salt. It has well graded streets and spacious squares, lighted with electricity. There are numerous instances in this underground city where not a single individual in three or four successive generations has ever seen the sun, or has any idea of how people live in the light of day.

To the patriotic Japanese, Shintoism really means more than Buddhism, for it makes a religion of patriotism. It is bound up with the national life. Scholars have declared that it is, technically, not a religion at all. That does not interfere with its being the religion of the great bulk of the Japanese people. It is most generally defined as ancestor-worship and nature-worship. Nearly every house has its god-shelf. The shrines, looking at a distance like beehives, may be found on every road in the empire. There are more idols to be seen in Japan than in Korea or China. In enlightened Tokio itself there are constantly recurring Shinto festivals, or matsuri.

Such are the two faiths that seek to unite with Christianity in Japan. The proposition comes from "advanced" thinkers, who say that "one religion is as good as another." What of Japanese Christianity itself, the power and prestige of which these outworn creeds seem to covet? Briefly expressed, there are fifty thousand Protestant church members in Japan, scattered all over the empire. There are an equal number of Roman Catholics, and almost as many Greek Catholics. It is with the first named that consolidation is sought, for the Protestant Christians are the aggressive, virile force in the nation's religious life. In all the cities there are churches. Some of the native pastors are men of such ability and influence that the government frequently takes counsel with them. Many Japanese Christians are in public life. An extraordinary number are editors and teachers. The influence of the Christians is out of all proportion to their numbers.

These, then, are the factors in the proposed union of Buddhism, Shintoism and Christianity. The simple statement of them shows how impossible the project is; for a spiritual religion, divinely revealed, cannot merge with gross idolatry and superstition, unless its adherents have only the faintest possible intelligence and loyalty. This is not the case in Japan. There the Church is true to type, and loyal to Jesus Christ as the only Saviour of mankind.

When I interviewed Buddhist priests and non-Christian statesmen and educators, I found them already interested in the proposed amalgamation, and generally quite eager for it. But when I talked with Japanese Christians and missionaries, in most emphatic terms they declared it impossible. They will not seriously entertain for a moment any thought of surrendering Christianity's claim to be the only true and sufficient religion, to which all others must eventually give way.

The whole matter was expressed in a nutshell by Matsamura, one of the most famous of Japanese authors, teachers and speakers, and a Christian man. When I asked him his view of the proposed union of the three faiths, he made a gesture to indicate the utter impossibility of any such thing. "Buddhism may be likened to the moon, and Shintoism to the stars," he said, "but Christianity is the sun. And when day dawns, moon and stars are swallowed up in the light of the sun."

One bleak December day in 1755, dark forms gathered crouching in the edge of the forest about the settlement. Seeing the place unprepared, the savages rushed whooping upon the log houses. The settlers fought desperately, but were overcome by the great odds against them. Most of the men were killed and the women and children carried into captivity. The houses were given to the flames, and the next morning only a few blackened chimneys marked the site of the village. One of Hoeth's daughters, Marianna, was forced to marry an Indian, but four years later managed to escape to Bethlehem. She lies in the old cemetery.

Dedicating the Monument to the Moravian Settlers

The Moravians purchased the site of the settlement in 1760 and founded a village of Christian Indians. This was given up a few years later.

The monument recording these historic events is of Vermont granite, and is placed as nearly as possible on the site of the cemetery laid out by the people of the second settlement.

The pilgrims to the dedication came by train as far as Saylorsburg, where carriages were waiting to take them seven miles to Gilbert. The oration of the day was delivered by Rt. Rev. J. Mortimer Levering.

OUR DUTIES TOWARD GOD

*INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFT

WHEN the host of Israel came to Rephidim they had their first encounter with a foe: then they fought against the Amalekites. Moses appointed Joshua general in command, while he himself went upon the mountain top carrying his rod, which had hitherto been his potent weapon, because it symbolized the power of God. Aaron and Hur went with him, and the three together viewed the battle in the plain below. When Moses stretched out his rod, as when he came before Pharaoh, Israel won; and when he let down his rod, Amalek prevailed. The help of God went with the outstretched rod. And so Moses held it up as long as his strength endured, and when he could no longer do it, Aaron and Hur on either side supported his arms. This they did until the sun went down and the day closed with victory for the Israelites.

Jethro's Advice

After this came a glad reunion for Moses with his family. His father-in-law Jethro, hearing how God had brought Israel out of Egypt, and delivered them also from Amalek, brought to Moses in the camp his wife Zipporah and their two sons, Gershom and Eliezer. In the family reunion they did not leave God out, for they offered sacrifices to him, and also invited the elders of God's people to break bread with them. During the short stay of Jethro in the camp of Israel we find a beautiful example of fatherly solicitude and counsel. It was Moses' custom to sit from morning until evening that he might adjust the difficulties which the people brought to him. Jethro saw that this was not wise, because Moses was not only overtaxing his strength, but he was making the people weak by settling their affairs for them; and so he reasoned with Moses, and Moses yielded to him, and appointed twelve able men whom the people could consult, leaving only large and important matters to be referred to him.

And God over all saw that a table of laws must be written which should be a personal guide for the people as well as a basis of government. An impressive manifestation was connected with his giving of the law. He commanded Moses to prepare the people for it by a three days' cleansing of their bodies and their clothes, which should be typical of the purifying of their lives by their obedience to the law about to be given. And they were forbidden to approach beyond a certain limit the mountain upon which the law was to be handed to Moses, in order that they might learn something of the majesty of law.

They were instructed to stand afar off until they should hear the voice of the trumpet summoning them to come as near to the mountain as they might. And God showed his great power on the day the law was to be given by making the mountain quake and smoke as a furnace. While the people stood round about, the voice of God was heard calling Moses to come up to the top of the mountain; and Moses, nothing fearing, went up to meet God, and God gave into his hand the Ten Commandments written upon two tables of stone.

Fundamental Truth

Moses and Christ both divide life into two overlying hemispheres of love: love to God and love to man. Love means right relations, which is also the best definition of religion. "Get right with God," that is the first and great commandment. But "the second is like unto it," of like importance and to receive like attention. Get right with your fellow men, in the social relations of business and politics and pleasure.

The fundamental truth to teach about the Commandments is that the moral law is an expression of divine love, a safe highway marked out by which we can avoid the thorns and mud and marsh that bring sorrow to the disobedient. "Thou shalt love God; thou shalt love man," on these two loves hangs all law. As Browning profoundly says: "All's love, yet all's law." The naturalist grows enthusiastic as he discovers the laws that govern the formation of rocks, the growth of vegetables, the instincts of animals; but how much more should we grow enthusiastic in contemplating the supreme moral law of God for the souls of men! It was that which made the writer of the 119th Psalm reiterate in many forms:

"Oh how I love thy law! it is my meditation all the day." If the children were from early years made to feel that law is but an expression of love, that parental law, God's law and the State law are "for our good always," they would sing of law as we now ing of love:

Moses Exhibiting the Tables of the Law to the Israelites

> Law divine, all law excelling,
> Joy of heaven to earth come down.

Too little attention has been given to the fact that the Commandments are a part of a "covenant"—the old covenant, the Old Testament, made not in Palestine for Jews only, but in Sinai for the world. It contains promises as well as commandments.

No doubt many sensitive souls are troubled because they find in their hearts mixed motives and contending affections. But the command to love God with all the heart manifestly means that loving loyalty to God shall be the dominant motive, to which others shall yield whenever there is a conflict.

As a boy may be constantly loyal to his father, or a man loyal constantly to his wife and to his country, even though he is not always thinking of them, so the supreme love to God required in the first table is a state of habitual loyalty to God. This interprets the First Commandment especially: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." This command has no reference to images and should not be confused with the Second Commandment. It is needed almost as much in America and Europe as in Asia and Africa. It means that God shall be to us more than gold or fame or pleasure; that when motives clash, duty to God shall habitually prevail. Whatever is first in our lives is our god. If there be anything we obey in preference to God, then we are idolaters. We do not need to go back to Bible times to see a "covetousness" that has become "idolatry," or to find those "whose god is their belly."

We have often listened to the plausible statement that the division of men into sheep and goats is unscientific. The claim is that the line of division goes not between men but through them; that every man is partly sheep and partly goat. This sophistic criticism of Christ's classification overlooks the fact that every man is predominantly good or bad, right or wrong, sheep or goat. It is the predominant motive that classifies us in spite of our mixed motives. We may not in this world love God perfectly or love God only, but we may and should love God supremely.

Three Kinds of Love

Some have feared their love of wife or child is in conflict with their love to God; but there is no more conflict than between sight and hearing and touch, for there are three kinds of love: first, the love of esteem that looks up; second, the love of sympathy for relatives and boon companions that looks around; third, the love of pity and compassion that looks down to lift up, love for the unlovely and unfriendly. The first is our love for God, while the last is distinctively "the love of God shed abroad in our hearts," that is, a love like God's for us, in that it is love for the unlovely. It is those who love God supremely, who love their families and the brotherhood of man most ardently.

Late one night a man came to see Dr. Torrey. "I am a Sunday School teacher," said the man, "and a professing Christian; but I am not right with God." "How do you know that?" "I feel wretched when I am teaching others," was the reply. "I know I am all wrong." "get right. Why do you not get ri "I would like to," replied the man nestly. "Well, it is very easy," sai doctor. "You have only to surrender will entirely to God." "Ah!" sai visitor, "that is just the difficulty. would mean a great deal to me, beca am in business and doing well." " well?" asked Dr. Torrey. "I made thousand dollars last year. I can cl see that to get right will cost me a deal." "It will cost you more not to right," said Dr. Torrey, gravely. "I believe that. Whatever it costs me, I get right." "Let us pray together a this," suggested the doctor. The two knelt in the study. Dr. Torrey pra Then there was a pause. Presently visitor surrendered all to God. The stru was severe and prolonged, but victory ca and the man departed calm and happy

What Children Are For

A Sunday School speaker had sh that a watch and a pencil and a knife good for nothing unless they can each the thing for which they were made. now what is a boy or girl made for? children were silent. "There is a beaut answer to that question which boys girls in Scotland learn. It runs: 'The c end of man is to glorify God and en him for ever.' That is what boys and g are made for." The children were list ing very attentively. "But if a boy girl does not do the very thing for wh she or he was made, what is that c good for?" "Good for nothing." came from their lips quite spontaneous "Good for nothing," repeated the gent man, solemnly. "I hope none of you be like that. Good for nothing! How and how terrible! But if you will yi your hearts to Christ your Saviour, he w make you good for something."

"Thou shalt not make unto thee a graven image." We are writing this l son in Japan, where side by side wi railroads and bicycles and dynam millions still come up in front of id and pull a bell to wake them up a then mumble a prayer. In Tokio saw in the centre of their "Coney land" a wooden god, the god of healin whose nose, and mouth, and eyes had been rubbed away by worshipers wh thought some virtue would be transferr to them by rubbing their hands acro the face of the god, then rubbing the across their own—an act far more likel to spread disease. Hardly less to b pitied are the thousands in Japan in th colleges, who are too well educated bow to images, but instead of turning t the true God have given up religio altogether. Idol images are always in tended to be only symbols of an invisibl God, guide boards pointing to him. Bu instead of helping the mind on to Go they halt the minds of many at the sym bol, and really become, instead of a gat to God, bars to keep from God. This i true of Roman Catholic images also, an sometimes of Protestant forms of wor ship, when prayers are mumbled with n more thought or desire than if they were so many beads counted off in a rosary.

Profanity

To swear is neither brave, polite nor wise. "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." This command, too, is violated when we go through any religious form heartlessly, whether sacrament or song or prayer. Children should be taught not only to "say their prayers," but to think them, and especially to make prayers of their own.

The most common violation of the Third Commandment is when profane men swear by the name of God. This is bad manners as well as bad morals. No gentleman will come up to a group of men and say ugly words of their mothers. It is just as disgraceful to say ugly words in a Christian's presence of his heavenly Father. Swearing is usually the sign of an empty mind and a scanty vocabulary. When a grown man is short of words, he fills up with oaths and curses.

THE ABBESS OF KHAN-DRO-YE

By BARBARA E. POPE

NORMU SALA was one of those extremely businesslike matrons who can be found, even among the wealthy, in the land of Tibet. She managed well her household, consisting of two amiable husbands, four children and a host of servants, and she had an eye to her home industries and the traffic on the borderland. She was a native of the Chumbi valley, and she was fond of her birthplace and proud of her connections with the priestly aristocracy. There had been a lama of high degree in her family for countless generations, and her husbands were blood relation to the Dalai Lama.

Normu's husbands were scarcely more than infants when, the then reigning Dalai Lama breathing his last, the deity soul of Avalokiteswara was set free for another reincarnation. In the courtyard of their uncle's home in Lhasa, they were playing with their family-favored little cousin at the very moment when the reincarnation must have taken place; and thus they acquired considerable merit in being the first to behold the beloved countenance of the new Dalai.

There was another holy personage in Normu's family, nearer of kin than the divine head of the hierarchy. This was her daughter Muna, a graceful maiden of eighteen, who, at the age of four, had become the reincarnation of Khan-dro-ye, benefactress, foundress of the nunneries, and perpetual abbess, through her many reincarnations, of the chief nunnery in Tibet. Some controversy had been, at the time, over Muna's claim to exaltation. The title of Abbess of the Nunnery of Khan-dro-ye carried with it the rank of first lady of the land, and many an ambitious mother coveted the eminence for her pretty tot. The Grand Lama of Tashi-lhumpo was confident that the soul of the abbess had passed into a serious-minded little girl in his own domain, and the Tashi being the direct reincarnation of Amitabha, his opinion was entitled to consideration in spiritual matters; but Normu Sala had costly presents to bestow, and a rich field, a portion of her patrimony in the Chumbi Valley, which she immediately transferred to the nunnery. So the Dalai Lama rendered his decision, and the council acquiesced, and none could longer doubt that in Muna would henceforth dwell the saintly essence of the abbess.

Outside the walls of Lhasa, where Normu Sala had lived since her marriage, could be seen on its rocky height, through the venerable poplars which shaded the front of her balconied granite house, the white, crimson, and gold of the magnificent Potala Palace.
